Elmira.

ELMIRA, Thursday, Nov. 16, 1871.

The founders of this ever-head-and-ears busy little City of Elmira gave it a name which is in strong contrast with its staid, determined, business-like, every-day fashion of fighting the battle of self-extension and commercial progress. There is something decidedly opposite in the ring of the words Trade and Elmira—the poetical and classic, and the matter of fact. But, doubtless, in these days of hard-earned breakfasts and suppers, no common schools, and news a month old from the Metropolis, the good fathers of Elmira had other fish to fry than studying the geographical advantages of their new-born village. Had they done so, had they noticed its location—a sort of half-way-house between the Hudson River and Lake Erie, a central position on the State line separating the south-western counties of New-York from Northern Pennsylvania, which inserts itself like a rectangular wedge into the State of New-York—had they noticed that it was due north of the great coal-mining districts, they must have seen at a glance that, at some future day, a large portion of the surplus productions of the Quaker State would inevitably find its way up the Valley of the Susquehanna into the Chemung Valley for distribution throughout all that section of the State lying west of a line drawn from Oswego to Binghamton. Elmira is the point of intersection, at right angles, of two great trunk lines of railroad—the Erie and the Northern Central. They are her godfather and her godmother—the powers that have sustained her with leading-strings, till, now, she is able to run alone.

The rapid extension of railway communication and the vast increase of production west and south of her, and of commerce north and east of her, are giving to Elmira every day more and more importance as a central railroad depot, and are consequently largely increasing her own domestic trade and manufacture. Manufacturers are locating there because of the facilities of transportation in all directions. It is no insignificant fact that both the Erie and Northern Central Railroads should have erected large car-shops there, introducing a foreign population of at least three thousand persons. By the Erie line, Elmira is in direct communication with New-York and Chicago; by the Albany and Susquehanna, with Albany and Boston; by the Northern Central, with Washington and Baltimore, Rochester and Buffalo, and all the coal lines of the lower regions of Pennsylvania. The Delaware, Lackawanna and Western brings her any amount of anthracite coal from Scranton and Pittston; the Jefferson branch of Erie does the same for her from Carbondale and Honesdale, beside giving her a second line to Scranton. From Northern Pennsylvania the Corning and Blossburg brings her bituminous coal of the best sort from the Blossburg mines—mines in which some of her own leading citizens are largely interested; and away it goes, driving the locomotives north, south, east and west. The Lehigh Valley Road connects with Waverly at the head of the Chemung Valley, from whence a special third rail is laid to Elmira. Mr. PRATT, the Division Superintendent of the Erie Road, tells me that 1,000 tons of coal pass daily from the Jefferson branch through Elmira to Rochester and Buffalo; 2,000 tons a day from the Lehigh Valley by way of Waverley, and 1,000 tons a day from the Shamokin district on the Northern Central. This last is mostly mined by a firm of local coal-owners. This is a pretty fair exhibit in coal transportation to begin with. In addition, 270,000 tons of general merchandise pass through Elmira every month, going east and west; and 50,000 tons a month going north and south, on the Northern Central alone. And then, as to passenger traffic. Tickets to the value of $150,000 were issued last year from Elmira, the value of the arriving tickets being about the same. But, and the item in itself shows the business importance of the city, the same authority informs me that the value of what are termed stop-off tickets, that is, tickets issued elsewhere for a point beyond, the holders of which stop for a few days or a week in Elmira, transact their business, and then continue their journey, is not less than $200,000 a year. Thus the passenger travel connected with Elmira is worth $500,000 a year.

Ten years ago Elmira was a small provincial town, with a population of eight thousand. Mr. JOHN J. NICKS, who is of the oldest inhabitant, says that when he first began to manufacture tobacco and cigars in a little bit of a place twenty-five years ago, the population was under two thousand. Today, Mr. NICKS is doing a business of two hundred thousand dollars a year, and the population is nearly nineteen thousand; more than double in ten years. It is as startling a change as the Israelites of old experienced when, as the sacred historian somewhat naively tells us: "Another king arose who knew not Joseph." By the way, I believe the interval was only about eight hundred years. An Elmira has arisen in the last ten years which the gone-by generation do not recognize, cannot understand, and gravely shake their headgear. It entirely passes their comprehension; but it is none the less a fact. The war aided very materially in bringing Elmira prominently into notice, and in inaugurating, indeed, branches of industry in her midst. Elmira was chosen not only as a rendezvous for newly-raised troops but also as a depot for rebel prisoners. Regiment after regiment of Union soldiers were mustered in there, even from so distant a State as Michigan, and generally remained for a month's drilling before being sent South over the Northern Central. The Government, moreover, always kept large sums of money in the banks, frequently amounting to millions, for the payment of the troops, generally from 5,000 to 10,000 men. This was a rare chance for the little town to make money. Then, again, the feeding, clothing, and housing of 5,000 troops and 10,000 rebel prisoners necessarily brought a large increase of local trade to Elmira. Thus she got a start in the business world which she was not slow to seize upon, and has unceasingly improved.

The principal trades of Elmira are rolling-mills and flour-mills, boots and shoes, groceries, hardware and dry goods—the last invariably wholesale and retail combined. The railroad car-shops, though bringing considerable business, purchase all their materials elsewhere. For its size, Elmira does an unusually large business of her own in coal, as a walk down Baldwin-street or a saunter in the neighborhood of the railroad depot will show. If you could only experience just one gust of the cold snaps at this moment so furiously racing together, you might be inclined to think that all the stock at present on hand would not be too much to warm the city. It is a sort of day to follow the prescription for warming oneself which some erratic genius has declared to be infallible—to drink a pint of cold water and sit on the hob of the stove till it boils.

Three large coal companies have their head-quarters in Elmira—the Pittston and Elmira, J. Langdon & Co., and the McIntyre. The two first deal exclusively in anthracite coal; the last is a bituminous coal company. The Pittston and Elmira own about 1,000 acres of coal farm, and have four mines in operation in the village of Pittston—the Rawme, the Seneca, and two mines known as the Twins. They have shipped this year nearly 200,000 tons of coal. For the last four years their business has been steadily increasing at the rate of thirty per cent. each year. They employ 1,200 miners. J. LANGDON & Co. own 1,000 acres of coal lands at Shamokin, in Northumberland County, about fifty miles from Pittston. They also ship 200,000 tons. The purely local trade among the small dealers of Elmira amounts to 30,000 tons a year. The two companies above named belong to one of the Pennsylvania associations, and share the business of their allotted district between them. Buffalo, Rochester, Oswego, Syracuse, and all the smaller towns west of Syracuse, buy largely of them. Considerable quantities of their coal are also shipped to Chicago, Milwaukee, St. Paul, and even as far as Omaha, being shipped in propellers and sailing-vessels, carrying from six hundred to one thousand tons, from their great depot in Buffalo. Coal takes twenty days in transit by the lake route, whereas it could be sent by rail in four days. But the advantages of sending it by the lakes are so great that the companies never ship by rail. Every year a vast number of vessels laden with grain come down from Chicago to Buffalo, and they are only too glad to carry back coal as ballast at seventy-five cents a ton. The freight by rail would be four or five dollars a ton. The companies formerly shipped their coal by way of the northern branch of the Pennsylvania Canal, which is connected with the Chemung Canal by the Junction Canal, twelve miles in length; the Chemung running into Seneca Lake. It was then passed through the lake to Geneva, on the Auburn branch of the New-York Central, and so on to Buffalo. The Junction Canal, however, is so small that it is totally inadequate to meet the largely increased business, and the coal is now sent by the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad to Syracuse, and then shipped to Buffalo by the Erie Canal, a distance of 197 miles, in barges carrying from two hundred to two and fifty tons, and drawing six feet of water, at the rate of ninety cents to $1 per ton. The railroad rates from the mines to Syracuse vary from $2 70 to $2 80. These rates enable the companies to ship coal to Chicago at $6 50 per ton.

The McIntyre Coal Company belongs to an association of coal-mining companies whose mines are located in the northern district of Pennsylvania, only forty miles from the State line. The association comprises the Morris Run, Fall Brook, McIntyre, Blossburg and Barclay mines. The McIntyre Company mines about 80,000 tons of coal a year, which is shipped to different stations along the New-York Central and Northern Central lines. This coal is almost exclusively used in locomotives and iron rolling-mills. The Company have a depot in Chicago, from which their agent often supplies fine coal to distant Western cities for blacksmiths' purposes, the bituminous coal of the far West containing so much soft soap-stone that it is barely fit for burning in locomotives.

A little beyond the railroad depot stand the Elmira Iron and Steel Mills, occupying ten acres of ground, and nearly the largest iron-works in the State. The proprietors believe that they have solved the much-vexed problem, the pons asinorum of engineering—how to make a strong, tough, flurous rail, which shall offer the resistance of a hard surface to the grinding of the wheels of the cars and locomotives. Their rail is neither all steel nor all iron, but is a compound of both materials—a steel head firmly welded on to an iron flange. The process of manufacture is a very simple one, and only adds ten dollars a ton to the cost of the rails. In the first place they have to make their steel, and this is done by a novel and inexpensive process. From Hanover County, in Pennsylvania, they get a stone which contains but a small percentage of iron and a very large amount of silicum. This stone, after being crushed to a fine powder by a machine which crushes five tons a day, is mixed with common pig-iron in the proportion of 25 to 100. The combination, when puddled, makes capital steel plates; and whereas borax, the ordinary agent, costs forty cents a pound, the crushed silicum does not cost half a cent a pound. Two of these steel plates are packed with the requisite number of common iron plates, and, after being heated, are rolled into rails; the steel retaining its place at the top and forming the head of the rail, the common iron forming the flange. The thoroughness of the welding is plainly seen in the samples which are broken daily for testing purposes. As one of the traveling public I sincerely trust that the faith of these gentlemen in their rails is not misplaced.

In addition, the mills make annually about sixteen thousand tons of merchant iron, supplying exclusively two locomotive works and three bridge-building companies. The Company have made bridge iron one of their specialties, and have gained a great reputation for the strength of the bridge iron they make. The Government test for this kind of iron is ten thousand pounds to the square inch, but some of theirs, tested at Buffalo, bore fifty-two thousand pounds to the square inch. No pig-iron from Pennsylvania is used at the mills, though manufactured iron is often shipped from them to Pennsylvania. The Company prefer pig-iron made from the ores of the Lake Superior, Champlain, Oneida, and Ontario mines. They purchase annually about fifteen thousand tons of pig-iron, ten thousand tons of silicum, and five thousand tons of scrap iron. All their iron when taken from the puddling furnaces, thirty-two in number, is well hammered by a five-ton steam hammer, in order to drive out the sulphur, phosphorus and other impurities. The Company have lately purchased eighteen acres of land about a mile from their works, on which they are erecting blast-furnaces. This will necessitate an outlay of $200,000, which, added to the $600,000 invested in their works and mills, will give them a capital of $1,000,000. The machinery of the mills is run by three engines of 250 horse-power, one of 150 and three of 40, besides several smaller ones. The works are in operation night and day, and give employment to 350 men.

The manufacture of shoes and boots was introduced into Elmira about seven years ago; and, while the first factory was being built, the wiseacres shook their venerable heads, and, with an effervescence of encouragement and good nature, sagely prophecied the speedy ruin of the coming master-cobbler. Several large and prosperous factories now bear testimony to the truth of the old adage, "the proof of the pudding is in the eating." Mr. RICHARDSON, of Water-street, employs some two hundred and fifty operatives, and is doing a business of $500,000 a year. The Co-operative Company, with a force of about eighty men, turn out $150,000 worth of goods; RICHARDSON, STEELE & Co., who only make ladies' fine shoes, do a business of $150,000; ATWATER & Co., of Railroad-avenue, manufacture fully up to $250,000, and employ one hundred and fifty hands; WILLIAM A. BARLOW does a business of over $100,000. There are other smaller firms. The retail trade is also large; in the aggregate, perhaps, $300,000; such firms as FOSTER, HUDSON & Co., on Water-street, selling $60,000, and JOHN STOBS, also on Water-street, $40,000 worth of goods a year. Mr. ATWATER took me through his factory. It is conducted on the principle of the great Massachusetts factories. Each part of a boot is cut out and made in its own particular department, sewn together in another, finished off elsewhere, treed, blacked, and made ready for market by some one else, and finally, sent down stairs to be approved and packed. Mr. ATWATER's firm, and all the others, with the exception of RICHARDSON and STEELE, make men's and youths' boots and shoes in French and American kip and calf leather, and very heavy boots, such as are worn by canallers, dockmen, and laborers. These goods are all "custom hand-made" and pegged. They also make women's boots in calf, goat, and grain, the tops and linings of which are sewed by machine. Last year Mr. ATWATER's factory turned out 30,000 pair of men's and youths' boots, 15,000 pairs of women's boots, and 5,000 pairs of brogans for farmers and miners. So much for the boot and shoe trade.

Facing ATWATER's factory, on Railroad-avenue, is the wooden-pipe factory of HORNE, AYRAULT & Co. These pipes are none of your old-fashioned log sort, but neatly square-sawed and bored timber. All the water of Elmira flows through pipes laid down by this firm. The neighboring City of Corning washes its dainty fingers and slakes its thirst from water brought into its houses through these wooden pipes, and lights its gas from supplies furnished through a similar conduit. The ARNOTTS, of the Chemung Canal Bank, and Dr. BRADLEY, of the Chemung Bank, (historic and highly respected names in Elmira,) lately formed a company for laying these pipes from Rochester to an apparently inexhaustible natural gas well at West Bloomfield, twenty-two miles away, and Rochester is now a blaze of light at night, without suffering from the insolent exactions and annoyances to which New-Yorkers have so long humbly submitted, and, thanks to the overflowing abundance of Dame Nature, without being under the apprehension of a rise in the price of coal causing a rise in the price of gas, or a strike in the mining districts imitating her in the grim pleasantries of spending her evenings in total darkness, or in the company of tallow candles. Messrs. HORNE & AYRAULT have another factory at Tonawanda. They send their pipes into Pennsylvania, Ohio and all the Western States, and find it difficult to keep up with their orders.

Elmira also thinks that her general trade is very large. Take the grocery business. DORMORE BROTHERS have a fine store on Carroll-street. In the rear is their coffee and spice mill, where they grind over $100,000 worth of goods a year. They also deal largely in liquors and in the wine grown in the Hammond's Port district. Their entire business amounts to $500,000 a year. FORRESTER, COVELL, & CO., of Water-street, do almost as large a business, besides dealing in dry-goods; D. L. HOLDEN, of Railroad-avenue, jobs to the amount of $400,000, and J. H. LORING, & Co., of Union Block, who also deal in liquors, $300,000. These firms, through their traveling agents, do business in Northern Pennsylvania, west as far as Michigan, and east as far as Middletown, besides supplying the local retail dealers. In flour, HOTCHKISS, WARD & Co., of the Elmira Mills, and JACOB FOUNTAIN & Co., of the City Mills, each do a business of about $500,000, and ship their flour to Southern New-York, Northern Pennsylvania, and East as far as Jersey City. The wholesale trade in hardware, too, is large. STOWELL & Co. and AYRAULT, ROSE & Co., both on Lake-street, are the principal manufacturers and jobbers. Their business amounts to $400,000 and $300,000 respectively. They make a specialty of what is known in the trade as shelf hardware, such as locks, cutlery, and carpenters' tools. They also make agricultural tools, spades, hoes, &c., and job largely in all kinds of saws and nails. Last year STOWELL & Co. sold 1,500 of BUSSEL's electric cross-cut saws, six feet in length, and 2,000 kegs of BURDEN's horse-shoe nails. Noble's Manufacturing Company, on the corner of Clinton and Baldwin streets, do a business of $250,000 a year in centre bits, augurs, and axes. There are also several large retail stores. HERRICK & SEELEY, of William-street, have a large and rapidly-increasing carriage-building business, of which sleighs form an important feature. The sales of M. RICHARDSON & Co., of Dunn's Block, in Yankee notions and domestic goods, amount to $300,000. E. B. SATTERLEE, of Lake-street, has a wholesale and retail business of $200,000 in gentlemen's furnishing goods, clothing, boots and shoes, and dry goods. JOHN J. NICKS, of Water-street, employs fifty hands, and manufactures $200,000 worth of tobacco and cigars. Mr. NICKS also owns a large retail store in connection with his factory. Strange to say Elmira does not boast, so far as I could learn, a pure et simple wholesale dealer in dry goods. Mr. W. L. HART, of Water-street, does a very large mixed business, wholesale and retail, probably the largest in the City. RHODES & MUNSON, of Lake-street, STRAUSS & SAMUEL, of Union Block, HOPKINS & WILSON, BARNEY, STOWELL & Co., all do a large trade; their local retail trade alone amounting to over $1,000,000. DURLIN & PRATT, of Water-street, in addition to their dry goods business, do a large trade in carpets. WILLIAM H. GREGG & Co. are the leaders in the wholesale drug business. WM. OGDEN & Co., of Water-street, trade largely in patent medicines. PERRY & Co., of Water-street, also do a considerable trade.

Take Elmira "for all and all," I think I am right in calling her an "over head and ears busy little city."

NOTES OF TRAVEL.

SAN FRANCISCO, Friday, Dec. 1, 1871.

Three weeks and more in San Francisco and vicinity, and they have gone by like three days and less. I have been a very bad correspondent during this time of times. All things without and within, seem to have been in league against my virtuous plans for work—the strange scenes, the bright sky and sea, sunshine and soft airs, novel street-sights, charming drives and walks, brilliant shops, theatres, libraries, cathedrals—and, above all, the great hearts of these people; hearts that keep open house for all visitors, and take us in, and wrap us around, and hold us fast by the kindest, warmest, cheeriest hospitality—a hospitality which, like the mercy of the Lord, is "new every morning." Who could sit tamely down to write in such incomparably and intoxeatingly lovely weather as we had for the first two weeks of my stay? And, when the rains came on—the first since May—and it was really chilly and dismal for three whole days, who would write then? What sensible Christian woman wouldn't curl up on a sofa and read novels? Now all is bright and balmy again; the waters of the bay sparkle with almost intolerable brightness, and the gardens and grounds have put on new greenness and glory. The garden under my window (my window which stands open) sends up the fragrance of heliotropes, mignonettes, geraniums, carnations, verbenas and magnificent roses, of many sorts. Fuschias are in full bloom, and oleanders, and the bounteous laurustinas, and a sort of honeysuckle, and sweet-peas and tube roses. So much for my dear flower-loving friends on the other side, by way of aggravation.

The house at which I am now perched, the home of a lovely "friend of my better days"—if I ever had any—is on the heights, and the windows command wide views of the city, of the purple-misted foot-hills of the coast-range—and of the bay and its islands. What with the near garden and the distant hills and waters, I have too much to look at altogether. Indolence is no name for the feeling that takes possession of me here. There is nothing of the Italian dolce far niente about it. On the contrary, it is perpetual excitement, and prompts to supernatural bodily activity. There is "a spirit in my feet" that will not let me rest. I cannot see enough of this picturesque land. I cannot drink in enough of the quickening sunshine, and the balmy, healing air of this strange new Summer—of this vast new sea. The very springs of life seem renewed here. Old enthusiasms, old pleasures, come back; old follies put off their sackcloth and shake off their ashes, and wear somewhat of their first perilous attractiveness. Scaling "wild oats" on every side, even I might be in danger of going into the culture of that most unprofitable cereal in a small way—might, in fact, believe myself young again, to all intents and purposes—were it not with me as with the worthy old Yankee who was inclined to consider himself a handsome man; "but somehow," he said, "public opinion is agin me on that p'int."

This bright, balmy weather gives one from the other side a strange, bewildered, feeling; an impression of something unnatural and almost incredible; of a small Rip Van Winkle experience; of having slept through the proper season of storms and snows, and bitter, biting winds, and of coming out on the world on a radiant May morning; for, look at the skies, so soft and blue, and innocent looking, and you half suspect some trick of celestial magic, and ask, "Where have you hidden away the Winter?" It is a country which one must get used to by degrees. It doesn't go by the almanac; its storms of wind and rain are done by big contracts; its "hired girls" are Chinamen; its theatres run on Sunday, and it knows not pennies and greenbacks.

It is odd, by the way, to see with what cool, not to say contemptuous indifference, people here regard our pretty pieces of postal currency. Even the vignettes have no little charm for them. They pass unmoved on the leonine head of STANTON, on the patrician face of FRESENDEN, on the fine figure of CHASE, with folded arms, awaiting the Presidency; on the engaging face of SPINNER—even on that brilliant accomplishment, his signature, and on the flourish, which is in itself a liberal education. It all comes from the influence of that omnipresent monopoly, the Bank of California. This, by the way, was the first San Francisco institution I visited. Here I found my money awaiting me, and here I saw more gold and silver coin, and bullion than I ever before beheld at one time. Of course, I gazed upon them with the calm superiority of a virtuous poet, rooted and grounded in the tenth commandment, but I can scarcely conceive of tastes more severe than that of a defunct Tweed or Connolly wandering about these vaults of riches, with ghostly hands and disembodied pockets. This Bank of California is certainly one of the most marvelous growths of the marvelous New World, and, doubtless is a stupendous power on the whole Pacific coast. Its officers are distinguished for their uniform courtesy and munificent hospitality. I am indebted to them for much kindness and many good offices which I can never pay back, even at usurer's interest. To the account of Mr. RALSTON and Mr. FRANKLIN I place some of the rarest and brightest of my long succession of pleasant experiences out here. The first was a drive to the Cliff House and the Seal Rocks, a famous resort some six miles from town.

The day was exceptionally clear and beautiful, even for this exceptional "they make 'em." The earth looked a little brown and dusty, but sky and sea and air were full of soft heavenly splendors, warmth and serenity. We drove through some of the finest streets of the pleasant, festive-looking city—the roses of a thousand gardens nodding to us as we passed—and out over the sand-hills and by green little nooks, market gardens and grain fields. I cannot tell how joyous and friendly looked to me the whole strange landscape, after the bleak hills of Nevada, whose square frowns gravely over her rough treasure-chests, like an unprotected female on a San Francisco landing, standing guard over her "effects" against a mob of cab-drivers. From the cemeteries on our route wore a cheerful, even go-to-meeting aspect, and the monuments of men who have had much to do with the history and fame of the State, of such men as BAKER and BRODERICK, rest, but a little shadow on the sunny day. Now and then, on the road, there were little silvery glimpses of the Pacific, but it was after all quite suddenly and with a keen thrill of surprise, that I caught my first full view of it, lying almost at our feet—immense, but not awful—majestic, but passing beautiful, smiling grandly under the sweet heavens, in its wondrous peace. It did not beat upon the shore like the gray Atlantic, in a sullen, thwarted way, but seemed to feel them gently, and to span them, in a benign and sovereign self-restraint, calling in its forces and lying back from the land. It appears older than the Atlantic, which somehow seems to date from the time of the Pilgrim Fathers, or of COLUMBUS, at the furthest. It murmurs of the most ancient mysteries of the East. Its very air smells of Cathay and tastes of old Cipango.

Cliff House has a long, broad verandah, facing the sea, and commanding fine views of the Golden Gate, of the dark, bold bluff of the peninsula, and of the rocky points beyond the curving beach. On this morning there were many sails in sight, some passing through the grand gateway, some coming up slowly before the soft wind, some melting into dreams of ships down the misty horizon. The Seal Rocks, three sharp, picturesque little islands immediately in front of the hotel, were crowded with sea lions—their strange, dismal, discordant barking filled the air. These particular sea-lions are under the protection of the law, and such old customers, that habitués as the Cliff House are able to stalk out the leaders, the solid citizens, and have given them distinctive and distinguished names.

I must confess I watched them with an eager, childish interest and enjoyment. An English tourist at my side remarked with a happy command of words, "What an extraordinary sight! Really, you know, I had no idea of it! What extraordinary creatures! and what an extraordinary noise they make!"—which are my opinions, better expressed.

Some of these sea-lions are monsters of their kind, weighing 1,000 or 1,500 pounds, they say. All seals, queer, grotesque, uncanny creatures, have for me a strange fascination—seeming like sinful human souls in wild torment—men, perhaps, who have warred and wasted, and lived free and high and fast, going through an uncomfortable metempsychosis, prisoned and pinioned in these flabby, slippery and clumsy forms. As you first see those on this coast, they seem continually to be flopping over the rocks or down into the water, and you say to yourself, "What a dreary thing it must be—an existence of flops!" But as you watch them further, you see that even a sea-lion's life is varied, for there is the wallow in the water, and the hitch up on to the rocks, the siesta in the sun, and the bark. When he is awake that is incessant. Day and night his "bark is on the sea." Sometimes, when they are all barking at once it pleasantly reminds one of the House of Representatives. Doubtless the sea-lion has his mare-tal relations; perhaps the plural style of marriage prevails in this thriving community, and all the middling-sized monsters grouped around the big ones were their consorts—"sealed" to them. If so, the ill-adjustment and discontent which nowadays seem almost inseparable from the blessed estate of wedlock, may account for some of the little unpleasantnesses observable on the rocks in the maddest and sleepiest times. Another reason why not here, more than in Congress, do we find peace and unity, is, perhaps, that here also they have a "Sumner" and a "Ben. Butler." Another big seal has been dubbed by some patriotic visitor "General Grant." This is a very quiet old fellow, and sleeps most of the time. He has a sullen, "deep-mouthed bay," yet I saw enough to be convinced that his bite is worse than his bark, for while I was regarding him as he lay in profound slumber, an enormous seal hatched himself up out of the water near by, made a careful reconnoissance, and deliberately went for him. You should have seen the old Pinedien majestically rear himself on his flippers, and heard his roar of angry defiance, which rang above the dash of the waves, and was echoed by every loyal seal on the rocks, except, perhaps, "Sumner." Then began one of the most exciting contests I ever witnessed. It seemed to come off in "rounds," like a prize-fight; the first assailant continually getting the worst of it. When he was severely "punished" by the General's tusks, he invariably fell back and lifted up his voice and wept. At last, after half a dozen disastrous attacks, he fell so far back that he flopped off the rock into the water, where he laid his sore head on the bosom of the deep and subsided. The victor gave one triumphant bark, turned over and went to sleep.

We had a sumptuous lunch, followed by the most invigorating, exhilarating, and altogether jolly beach-drive I have ever had to record—and I have enjoyed many a one during my weary earthly pilgrimage. Our drive back to town through the old Mission Dolores gave us charming views of the ocean, the country, and the city. On the whole, it was a day to be "marked by a white stone," but my stock of pebbles of that sort is giving out.

From that noisy concourse of sea-lions and lionesses to a gathering of the "best society" of San Francisco, from those gray rocks to elegant salons, from no dress to full dress, from wild barking to classic music, from flopping to galopping, is a long step; yet the next incident of note marked in my diary is a large party at the house of His Honor Mayor BELDEN. It was as brilliant and enjoyable an affair as the most genial hospitality, the most bounteous entertainment, fine music, flowers in marvelous abundance, splendid toilets, beauty, grace, and gayety could make it. San Francisco has, it seems to me, an uncommonly large proportion of beautiful women. I meet at every social gathering matrons of mature age and over, with fine symmetrical figures, and fresh, clear complexions, and I see everywhere young girls that match the otherwise incomparable roses they twist on their lovely garden terraces.

I have spent a couple of mornings in the Chinese quarter. I have stood hushed in the "dim religious light" of the Chinese Temple, and snuffed the incense that floats about the shrine of Joss; I have dissipated at the Chinese Theatre. But these are themes to be served up by themselves, and with more ceremony. I do not like to pass over in silence, yet I have left myself no space worthily to recount my next and most delightful experience—a visit, with a party of dear old friends, to Belmont, Mr. RALSTON's place on the San Jose road, with excursions to the fine country seats in that vicinity. We were met at San Mateo, about six miles this side of Belmont, by Mr. RALSTON's char-a-banc and four, and driven through the grounds of several noble residences, grounds generously open to the public at all times. I have never seen anything in America so fine as some of the avenues and parks we drove through that golden afternoon. They have not the dainty neatness of Eastern parks and pleasure-grounds, but they are more picturesque by far. They are less prim than primitive. Nature has been respected as the great original landscape-gardener. These are grounds to satisfy the artist and delight the sportsman, for wild vines and shrubs run and spread "at their own sweet will;" the beautiful gray moss festoons the limbs of gnarly old oaks, and droops and trails with indescribable wild grace, and fallen branches, and bushes, and ferns make admirable covers for game.

Through paling sunset glories and freshening evening airs we drove up the "Devil's Cañon," in which is cunningly and coolly hidden away Mr. RALSTON's charming villa—the representative "open house" of California, the very temple of hospitality. It may be expected that I shall describe at some length a visit which was to me like a day in fairy-land, or a chapter out of Lothair, but when I entered that house I left the reporter outside. The next day, after lunch we had another drive along magnificent roads and through a bewildering succession of stately avenues and noble parks, visiting vineyards and almond orchards, and wonderful flower-gardens and palatial stables, strolling over lawns still marvelously green, rowing in miniature ponds, petting tame deer—such lovely or lordly creatures!—and inspecting beautiful blood-horses. "Beautiful! Sir, you may say so!" There was one gray, I remember, with a mane like the surf of the Pacific, and a tail like the "Bridal Veil" of the Yosemite.

But the sun that had shown all day long with almost Midsummer warmth and splendor, dipped toward the waiting sea, casting back on the lovely coast hills a smile of tender reluctance. So we went—even more tenderly reluctant—met the train at Menlo Park, and reached the city in the early evening—like children tired out with pleasure, and like a certain old Yankee I have heard of, feeling that, "after all, there's too much fun in this world for poor folks."

By the way, at Redwood City, which we drove through on that day, we saw a rather handsome Court-house, of one story, the second having been toppled down by an earthquake. In this town was the home of the late Hon. HORACE HAWES, and somewhere here he planned to have built the great university, which was to make him more famous than HORACE the poet, or HORACE the philosopher, or the Rome HORACE. But as that eccentric millionaire's last will came not to case or earth, without monstrous injustice to a long-suffering wife and greatly-abused children, it is to be set aside on abundant proof of some mentality and much "pure cussedness." Were it allowed to stand—were the judgment of the Court now trying the case against the contestants of the will, earthquakes should be let loose among California Court-houses. They would be good things to have about.

I went to San Jose last week, and I had an adventure, by the way, which, at a more convenient season, I shall deem it my duty to recount. Till then, adieu.

VIRGINIA.

Suspending the Issue of New Bonds—Resolutions Against Repudiation—Pardon of Ex-Mayor Chahoon—State Treasurer Ege—No Appropriation for Interest.

From Our Own Correspondent.

RICHMOND, Va., Monday, Dec. 18, 1871.

This Virginia Legislature certainly acts with great promptness, if not with discretion. The House of Delegates has already passed, by the decisive vote of 104 to 18, a joint resolution suspending the issue of bonds under the Funding bill for an indefinite time, and the resolution is the special order in the Senate to-day, where it is under discussion now. There is no doubt that the Senate will concur in passing the resolution. Whether the Governor will approve, is very doubtful; but should he interpose his veto, it is believed that this and other measures in regard to the public debts of the State can be passed by the required two-thirds majorities, to give them effect without his assent.

To-morrow, in the House of Delegates a joint resolution to postpone the payment of interest on the refunded debt until otherwise ordered, is the special order, and there is every reason to expect that it will be passed at once by a vote nearly as large as that given already in favor of the resolution to stop the funding. In the House, also, has been offered by Major J. C. HILL, of Albemarle, a bill to amend the Funding bill, so as to postpone the payment of interest on the new issue of bonds until Jan. 1, 1877, and to provide that the coupons of these bonds shall not be receivable for taxes, &c., due the State until after Jan. 1, 1877.

Mr. R. T. DANIEL, member of the House from this city, and Chairman of the Conservative State Executive Committee, who is the resolute opponent of the measures above enumerated, and a warm supporter of the Funding bill, has introduced a series of resolutions against repudiation, which declare that it is not the intention of this Legislature to repudiate the public debts of the State, and that any attempt to do so is forbidden by the Constitution of Virginia, as well as that of the United States. These resolutions are a special order for to-morrow, and I believe there is no special objection to them, except that they are unnecessary and uncalled for and may be used to put a wrong construction upon what is done to arrest speculations under the Funding bill.

Mr. DANIEL has not so far pursued a course in the House to gain support from either friends or foes to anything which he may propose. He is arrogant, impatient and irritable, and friends members of both parties by his insufferable airs and pretensions. He has so long been the autocrat (or Bill Tweed) of Conservative politics in Richmond and Virginia, that he cannot bear to be opposed or thwarted, and his exhibitions of ill-temper are frequent and disgusting. In addition to this he is probably the only member of the House, out of all its large Conservative majority, who is an unpensioned and unrecruited Bourbon Democrat, without a single new idea, feeling or impulse on any public question or matter whatever. He has learned nothing and forgotten nothing, and the war and its results have only served to intensify his old hates and prejudices, and to confirm him the more strongly in his old opinions. Hence, nobody was surprised that the other day, apropos of nothing at all, he should suddenly burst forth with a hot declaration of his utter detestation of the present Constitution of the State, and avow his determination to do all in his power to upset it, root and branch. He had never, he said, been a reformer, but he would assume that character toward the new Constitution as soon as the State of Virginia were really free, which he said she would not be until a very different Administration from that in power now at Washington ruled the country. When that time arrived he would himself inaugurate a movement to repeal the atrocious and atrocious instrument, and to form another more consonant to the will and wishes of Virginians. Nobody was alarmed at this, for this tremendous announcement was only a cause for smiles from all who considered how supportive the speaker is both with the people and the Legislature. He received the lowest vote on the whole Conservative ticket from this city.

Gov. WALKER has pardoned Ex-Mayor CHAHOON, in compliance with the recommendation of the jury which convicted him, and with the petition signed by a multitude of influential citizens of both parties. Some people here do not like this exercise of clemency; but it is generally considered very proper—not so much because of a belief in CHAHOON's innocence, but because it is thought that he has suffered enough in body, mind and estate since June, 1870, when he was first indicted and arrested; and, further, because to send him to the Penitentiary might invite retaliation in some of the cases coming before the Federal Courts in Virginia under the Enforcement act. It is just to CHAHOON to say, nevertheless, that it is reported that Gov. WALKER was no little influenced to his action by Judge W. W. CRUMP, Counsel for CHAHOON, who solemnly affirmed to his Excellency that, upon a full knowledge of the testimony, both that given in Court and that excluded, he did not believe that CHAHOON was guilty. The newspapers here approve of the pardon.

The capital officers were elected today in the Legislature, and all the old incumbents were retained except GEO. EGE, State Treasurer, who was thrown over, and Col. JOSEPH MAYO, Jr., put in his place. Mr. EGE was one of the few Republicans who joined with the Conservatives in the Walker movement of 1869. He has had his reward for his services, and now he is cast adrift.

In response to a resolution of the House of Delegates, the Attorney-General of the State today submitted an opinion in which he considers that the payment of interest on the new bonds issued under the Funding bill, is not authorized by that bill nor any other existing act, and that further legislation will be necessary to authorize such payment. It is pretty certain that this Legislature will not give the "further legislation" required.

The Indiana Governorship.

The Indianapolis Journal states, by authority, that the use of United States Senator MORTON's name in connection with the Republican nomination for Governor of Indiana, is without his consent and contrary to his wishes; that in no event will he allow his name to be used in that connection, and that during the canvass he will take an active part in behalf of the nominee of the convention. The Journal also publishes a communication recommending Gen. THOMAS A. MORRIS for the position, and says: "No better man has been named for the place. His ability is unquestioned, his experience varied and extensive, his business and private life without a stain, and his Republicanism of the genuine stamp. The Republican Party would honor itself by nominating him, and if elected he would honor the high office for which he has been named."

WINTERING IN CAIRO.

From the Pall Mall Gazette.

The Sanatory advantages of an Egyptian Winter, though not half known and appreciated, are still to a certain extent familiar to that portion of the public who may be called invalids in search of a climate. But their ideas on the subject are generally limited to a voyage up the Nile. Now, though there is no doubt that the Nile trip is among the most delightful of journeys, and though it is equally certain that Upper Egypt in the Winter is as superior in point of climate to Lower Egypt as Egypt generally is to any other invalid-sought country, still many and advantages to health may be gained (without any very extraordinary expenditure) by deciding to move from going to Cairo and spending the Winter there. Formerly Cairo was but one of the most interesting spots in the great Eastern tour, a point of departure for the Nile and the Desert, picturesque, indeed, enough that made the traveler's enforced stay there very welcome to him, but offering no inducement for a lengthened residence to the artist and the antiquary. The hotels were bad and expensive, and any other way of living could only be arranged with difficulty, and was attended with much discomfort. In addition to these drawbacks, the invalid felt that there was no possibility of his enjoying fresh air outside the town, the state of the roads being such as to convert a carriage into an instrument of torture; while healthy men looked in vain for some means other than drinking German beer in a low hove', of obtaining in the evening from the solitude of a bedroom, or the not less distasteful motley companionship of the general sitting-room, and killing time between table d'hôte and bed. Now all this is changed. The hotels, from what they should be, are so improved as to make a residence in them no longer comparable to detention in a quarantine on prison fare; houses and lodgings furnished and unfurnished, are to be had, though the difficulty still remains of getting certain articles, and one or two other things necessary to the comfort of a Winter establishment, renders that an open question for travelers to make, more than they are assisted by the experience of some predecessor. In a year or two, however, these difficulties will probably have been a good deal smoothed away. In the meantime very comfortable arrangements can be made at the hotels for a lengthened stay. For an afternoon drive there is a choice of three capital roads—to Shoobra, to Geezeh and the Pyramids, and to the Mokattam and Palace of Koobe, the last a really magnificent situation open to the fresh pure air of the Arabian desert. The younger may stroll into the public gardens of the Ezbekeyeh, where music, cafés and beer-houses offer much the same programme of amusement as is to be found in a German Volksgarten. Twice a week, too, the beautiful gardens of the Khedive's Palace at Gezeerah are open to all who take the trouble to get a ticket; and gay music, green turf, luxuriant shrubberies, brilliant flower-beds, a numerous and constantly augmenting collection of African birds and beasts, with a blue sky and sun warm but not too ardent overhead, and a soft, delicious atmosphere all around, make this as pleasant a lounge as could be desired. In the evenings, an opera, which for comfort in the arrangements and excellence in the music, singing, and *mise

A Chapter on Natural History.

INSECTS AT HOME. Being a Popular Account of Insects, their Structure, Habits and Transformation. By Rev. J. G. WOOD, M. A., F. L. S. &c., author of "Homes Without Hands," "Bible Animals," "Common Objects of the Sea-shore and Country," &c. With upward of 700 Figures by E. A. Smith and J. R. Swaine. Engraved by G. Pearson. New-York: CHARLES SCRIBNER & Co.

The contributions to the literature of natural history during the last few years have been so numerous and important that it has been almost impossible to keep pace with them. Among the workers in this field so full of fascination, probably no single writer and investigator has done more effective service in popularizing the studies which he prosecutes with such unflagging diligence than the author of this volume. His extended work upon natural history, with the Homes Without Hands and Bible Animals, make a library in themselves, to which this Insects at Home is a valuable and acceptable addition. In the introductory paragraphs of this volume Mr. WOOD reveals the secret of the success which he has achieved as an author. "The real cause of the general repugnance to science," he tells us "is to be found in the mode of writing adopted by too many scientific writers, who forget the first principles of instructive writing and do not identify themselves with the minds of those whom they are endeavoring to teach." "The study of Entomology, or the knowledge of insects," he adds, "has greatly suffered from this cause. It is one of the most fascinating of pursuits. It takes its votaries into the treasure houses of nature and explains some of the wonderful series of links which form the great chain of creation. It lays open before us another world, of which we have been hitherto unconscious, and shows us that even the tiniest insect, so small perhaps that the unaided eye can scarcely see it, has its work to do in the world, and does it. Among the insects, too, we find not only instinct, but reason. We find that in these lower creatures the passions and emotions of humanity have their counterparts. Love, for example, developes itself in many ways, and so does hate; and, indeed, if the whole list of human qualities be examined, there is scarcely one which cannot be found in the insect world."

The habits of insects are mines of interesting knowledge, and it is impossible carefully to watch the proceedings of any insect, however insignificant, without feeling that no writer of fiction ever invented a drama of such absorbing interest as is acted daily before our eyes, though to indifferent spectators. Thus, even in the mere structure of insects there is more than enough material for the study of a lifetime. Putting aside the wonderful internal mechanism, which ought to be examined when practicable, the outward form is full of interest. We find among insects a variety and brilliancy of color that not even the most gorgeous tropical flowers can approach, and that some of our dullest and most insignificant little insects are, when placed under the revealing lens of the microscope, absolutely blazing with natural jewelry. The variety of form, too, is quite as boundless as that of color, so that there is much excuse even for the mere collector, who cares nothing for insects unless he can kill them and set them in rows in a cabinet. In the following pages," he says, "I intend to describe, as far as possible within so limited a space, insects at home, and, though giving the needful scientific information, to use few technical terms, and always to explain those which of necessity must be employed."

After this enthusiastic exposition of the interest which attaches to his subject, Mr. WOOD defines very simply what an insect is, discusses their general characteristics, and then proceeds to consider them in detail, giving careful directions to the young student as to the proper method of dissecting them and of preparing them for their place in the cabinet. Mr. WOOD, of course, follows other writers upon this subject, in assigning the leading place to the family of beetles, which are universally acknowledged to hold the leading rank among insects, since their development is more perfect than is found in any of the other orders; and first among the beetles he describes the geodephaga, or earth-devourers—that is, the beetles living on the ground. With reference to nearly every variety of insect which he describes, Mr. WOOD has some curious fact to relate, which shows how faithfully he has studied the habits of all of them, but we can of course only glean a paragraph here and there. Thus we have this graphic picture of the bombardier beetle:

"There is a prettily-made, though soberly-colored, little beetle, called brachinus explodens, the latter title being given to it in consequence of a most singular property which it possesses, and which is almost unique in the animal kingdom. It secretes a certain quantity of volatile fluid, which it has the power of retaining or compelling at will. When alarmed, it throws out a small quantity of this fluid, which immediately volatilizes with a slight explosion when it comes in contact with the atmosphere, and looks very much like the fire of miniature artillery. In consequence of this phenomenon, the insect is sometimes called popularly called the bombardier beetle.

"This curious property is used in defense. The beetle, being a small and comparatively feeble one, is liable to be attacked by the larger geodephagous tribes belonging to the genus carabus. The latter insect would have no chance of escape but for its curious weapons of defense. When the carabus chases the brachinus, the latter waits until the former has nearly reached its prey, and then fires a gun, so to speak, in its face. The effect on the carabus is indicated. The insect seems quite scared at such a repulsive return, makes a way from the tiny blue cloud, and allows its intended prey to reach a place of safety.

"These beetles love wet situations, especially when the water is brackish, and hide under stones and in crevices, so that they are seldom seen except by insect hunters. The banks of tidal rivers are great hunting grounds for the searcher after these beetles, as are the shores of Kiel, or even Woolwich, on its mouth. They are found in greatest numbers below Gravesend, and ten or twelve may sometimes be seen under a single stone, firing off their artillery from the crevices of their shelter.

The volatile fluid which produces such curious effects is secreted in a little sac placed within the end of the abdomen. It is not only capable of repelling the largest beetles by its explosion and cloud of blue vapor, but is potent enough to discolor the human skin when discharged against it, as many have found who have captured bombardier beetles by hand. Should it get within the eyelids, the pain and irritation produced would be almost unbearable, and can only be removed by a corresponding amount of the strongest vinegar.

The whole of the contents are not ejected at one discharge, but there is sufficient to produce a series of explosions, each successively fainter than its predecessor. Even after the death of the beetle the abdomen may be made to explode by pressure, the abdomen between the finger and thumb. Even in our small British species the pronounces is very considerable, but there are much larger species in better countries which produce much louder explosions, accompanied with quite a cloud of vapor."

Having disposed of the geodephaga, Mr. WOOD takes up the hydradephaga, or carnivorous beetles of the water—the whales, porpoises and seals of the insect world. Regarding the general characteristics of these beetles we have the following interesting remarks:

"We now find all animals are specially adapted to the life which they have to lead, and therefore may naturally expect that beetles which live in the water will be formed very differently from those which reside on the land, even though they land be occasionally wet. Snape, for example, is likely to be altered. We know that the whales, dolphins and seals, who have to pass either the whole or the greater part of their lives in the water, and to catch in it the living prey on which they feed, become assimilated in shape to the fishes; and it is likely that insects will obey the same laws as mammals. This is really the case, the shape of all the hydradephaga being very fish-like, in order to enable them to pass more easily through the water. As there is much more friction in passing through the water than through the air, the water beetles, as the hydradephagan are familiarly called, have the various portions of the body fitting closely to each other, so as to leave an uniform smooth and polished surface, something like that of the costly carving of the fish, the slippery skin of the whale, or the polished hull of a yacht. The general form in which they have been living, they always crawl up a reed or a water-plant, so as to gain space to spread their beautiful wings. In consequence of this freedom of locomotion, this beetle may be found in almost any pond, however small it may be. Even when ponds have been reduced to dirty puddles, the dirtiest pools of water, the dryness may be found plentifully, hiding itself in the still soft mud.

The mode in which this insect breathes is really wonderful. Being an insect, it is formed to breathe atmospheric air, and yet it has to pass the greater part of its time under water. The problem is solved by the beetle converting itself for the purpose into a diving-bell, carrying the supply of air as often as needful. This is accomplished in the following way: The body is rather flat, so that there is a space between the folded wings and the elytra. Now, these elytra are very large, and, when closed, are quite air-tight. When the beetle wishes to descend, it comes to the surface of the water with the head foremost, and just exposes the tip of its abdomen to the air. In a moment it has expelled the air which has already been used in breathing, and taken in a fresh supply, with which it dives to the bottom. As the spiracles, or mouths of the breathing-tubes, open into the space between the elytra and the abdomen, they can take in the air, and pass it through the whole system. Even if the observer will approach very quietly, he may see the beetles dealing with the heads downward, the tips of their tails just above the surface of the water, and their hind legs spread out so as to balance the body in this strange position. All the dytiscidæ employ this curious method of supplying themselves with air, but it is most conspicuous in the larger species, and is therefore described in connection with this beetle."

The burying beetles, the blind beetles, the pill beetles, the click beetles, the soldiers and sailors, with those so destructive to the labors of the agriculturist, are described with great thoroughness and detail. At least one-third of the volume is devoted to this important family, and then the dermaptera and orthoptera are taken up. Under the latter head we have the following interesting facts regarding a nuisance which, it is a satisfaction to know, is as prevalent in England as it is here. Mr. WOOD writes:

"The domestic cockroach, (blatta orientalis,) which has completely taken possession of England, as it is well known, was originally imported from the Levant, and was confined to the seaport towns. The climate, however, suited it, and as did the prevalence of kitchen fires, which are allowed to smolder through the greater portion of the night, thus affording the requisite supply of warmth. As for moisture, which is of as much importance to insects as warmth, the dripping of the kitchen pump are generally sufficient for the purpose. However this may be, the insects have spread themselves over England in a manner which is really wonderful considering that the female is wingless, and cannot therefore be transported by other means of locomotion than her own limbs can supply.

"The cockroach should spread over London is easy to understand, for there it found its own, and the insect could therefore establish itself firmly enough by the water-side, and afterward make its way to different parts of the metropolis, a task in which it is greatly assisted by the lawlessness and her habits. Insecurity and uncleanliness, which are the principal agents in the dispersion of the cockroach. Her watchfulness, with its perpetual fire and water, is a very paradise for the cockroach, which multiplies therein exceedingly, keeping itself hidden during the day, according to the wont of these light-loving insects. The cockroaches being made up her baskets of linen, one of her well-stocked nest; and as soon as the light is removed out come the cockroaches in shoals, and hold revel all night in the warmth and wet of the room. In the morning they mostly retire to their hiding-places, but, if suddenly disturbed, scurry off to any place which may present them, and find the linen-baskets open to their use. Should a few remain in the baskets, they are carried off to the various houses where they escape and soon produce fresh colonies.

Still, though the cockroach can be carried about London by the laundress, it cannot reach the interior of England by such means, and is in all probability carried in hampers, paper parcels and boxes, having crept into them while the goods were waiting in the London offices.

Like many other insects, the cockroach has a habit of discharging from its mouth a dark-colored fluid which possesses a most abominable smell. This odor, indeed, is one of the principal reasons why the cockroach is so universally detested, for, though the insect itself is rarely frequent becomes in time impregnated with the nauseous odor, which sometimes is so powerful that it sensibly affects the flavor of provisions that have been left in larders in which the cockroaches are specially plentiful. Yet, in spite of this odor, and possibly on account of it, the cockroach is fed with many delicacies, and, almost all insectivorous birds being fond of it, and the hedgehog being so partial to it that one of these animals is sometimes kept in the kitchen for the express purpose of destroying cockroaches.

I have even heard of a case where human beings have been free from the usual dislike of these insects. Some thirty years ago two young ladies, sisters, were at school in London, where they had been sent from Jamaica, their native place. After every one but themselves was asleep they used to get up quietly, slip down into the kitchen, and there catch and eat the cockroaches. This extraordinary habit was not found out for some time, and at last the mistress found it out, and remonstrated with them. They, however, defended themselves by saying that they had seen her eat shrimps, which fed upon all manner of carrion, whereas the cockroaches were clean feeders, living on the crumbs which had been suffered to lie about in the kitchen. Even this, however, discovery is was almost impossible to keep them from the kitchen at night, so strong was their love of the cockroaches."

In this same entertaining way Mr. WOOD runs through the different families of insects, great and small, describing very graphically, and as the result of his own observations, their habits and peculiarities. Hardly a page of the book can be turned which does not attract by the statement of some novel fact in this fascinating field of investigation. Mr. WOOD's descriptions are greatly aided by the admirable illustrations which are scattered profusely through the text. Those in the letter-press are mainly technical, but they are so arranged that the amateur may color them for himself and thus make the volume a source of endless pleasure and amusement. The full-page illustrations are most admirably executed after spirited and life-like designs, and the whole work is a valuable and thoroughly popular treatise upon a subject which was never before had so capable and enthusiastic exposition.

BOSTON'S LITERARY RECORD.

Closing Chapter of the Publishing Season—Books Issued During 1871—Over Three Hundred Now Ready—Work Planned for Next Year.

From Our Own Correspondent.

BOSTON, Wednesday, Dec. 20, 1871.

For the purpose of adding Boston's statement to the literary page of the record of the year now about to be closed, I have been endeavoring to ascertain the extent and the character of her contributions to the literature of 1871. In the first place I find that nearly, if not quite, two hundred new books have been published from here between January last and the present time, exclusive, be it understood, of reissues of old works or sets of works, reproductions from the English, and school or local books. Among the writers of these books have been Longfellow, Bryant, Tennyson, Holmes, Whipple, Whittier, Hawthorne, Bayard Taylor, Bret Harte, Joaquin Miller, John Hay, W. D. Howells, Col. T. W. Higginson, Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, Harriet Prescott Spofford, Louisa M. Alcott, Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe, Mrs. A. D. T. Whitney, J. T. Trowbridge, Edward Everett Hale, Richard Henry Stoddard, William Winter, William Allen Butler, John Weiss, and others of similar stamp.

The year has been especially notable for the publication of LONGFELLOW'S Divine Tragedy, TENNYSON'S new poem, The Last Tournament; BRYANT'S translation of the Odyssey; BAYARD TAYLOR'S rendering of GOETHE'S Faust, the publication of BRET HARTE'S works, prose and poetical; the sudden and brilliant rise of JOAQUIN MILLER, "the singer of the Sierras;" the publication of Miss ALCOTT'S juveniles, the discovery of a posthumous romance by HAWTHORNE, the "Septimius Felton," now started in the Atlantic, and the end of the career of Every Saturday as an illustrated paper. The year has also been notable for the publication of a new and elaborate edition of HAWTHORNE; also fresh editions of SCOTT, impelled by the revival of interest in the "Wizard of the North" by the notices of the Scott Centennial; of TENNYSON; of HUDSON'S SHAKESPEARE; of BURNS' poetical works; of LONGFELLOW'S poems, elaborately illustrated; new and complete edition of LONGFELLOW'S DANTE; and of THEODORE WINTHROP'S few but cherished works.

Classed as prominent reproductions from the foreign may be BROWNING'S new poem, Balaustion's Adventure; MORITZ RETZSCH'S Outlines to Shakespeare; English Lessons for English People, the joint production of Prof. SEELEY, author of Ecce Homo, and Prof. E. A. ABBOTT; the Nonpareil Series of English Classics; BURNAND'S Happy Thoughts; the third part of WILLIAM MORRIS' Earthly Paradise; that superb book of chrome-lithographic plates illustrating the coast of Norway, and the similar book illustrating the Nile; that exquisite Holiday book, Good Night and Good Morning, Lord HOUGHTON'S little poem, illustrated by WALTER SEVERN'S delicate etchings; Miss ROSSETTI'S Sing-Song; EDWARD LEAR'S nonsense songs, stories, botany and alphabets; EDNA DEAN PROCTOR'S A Russian Journey; the books of HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN—Pictures of Travel, A Poet's Bazaar, Stories and Tales and The Story of My Life; DORE'S Bible, in English, with fine steel engravings from DORE'S drawings; the Abbotsford edition of the Waverley Novels; a superb edition of THACKERAY, and others of like character.

And now concerning the style of the books of the year. Take first those of a miscellaneous character. LONGFELLOW'S, and BRYANT'S, and TENNYSON'S, and BRET HARTE'S and some others I have already noted. WHIPPLE'S contributions have been two choice books of essays, Success and Its Conditions and Literature and Life. Then come WHITTIER'S John Woolman's Journal, and that beautiful book of children's poesy, Child Life; OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES' essay on Mechanism in Thought and Morals; Col. HIGGINSON'S Atlantic Essays; JOHN HAY'S Castilian Days, Pike County Ballads and Jim Bludso; HOWELLS' Their Wedding Journey, illustrated by HOPPIN; Miss PHELPS' The Silent Partner, leveled at the present treatment of mill and factory operatives; PAUL KONOWKA'S designs in silhouette, his last work, illustrating Falstaff and His Companions; PHILIP GILBERT HAMERTON'S new edition of his Unknown River, improved by his etchings, and Thoughts About Art. Also, those remarkable books by Rev. Dr. BUSH, Rose Culture, Peter Wundt and Ad Fidum; The Private Life of Galileo, compiled chiefly from his correspondence and that of his eldest daughter; that exquisite book, A Journey Round My Room, translated from the French of DE MAISTRE; Fireside Science, a series of popular scientific essays upon subjects connected with every-day life, by Dr. JAMES R. NICHOLS, author of Chemistry of the Farm and the Sea, and editor of the Boston Journal of Chemistry; RICHARDSON'S stories from old English poetry; and CLEMENT'S hand-book of legendary and mythological art, one of the most readable and fascinating books of its kind. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS' Chapters of Erie have also attracted much attention; and so has JAMES FREEMAN CLARKE'S Ten Religions, and JOHN WEISS' Radical Essays on American Religion. Just out are Mrs. GREENWOOD'S Arabesques, stories of the supernatural, and Mrs. STOWE'S Oldtown Fireside Stories, and judging by the large orders which their publishers are filling and receiving, it will be safe to place them also among the successful books of the year. Fireside Science, mentioned just above, is also one of the very newest books, barely out. Its scope is shown by this list of some of the topics: "The Origin and Nature of Springs;" "Chemistry of a Hen's Egg;" "Rebreathed Air;" "Chemistry of a Cigar;" "Chemistry of a Pint of Koroseine;" "Chemistry of a Lump of Sugar;" "The Clothing we Wear;" "Experiments with Air-furnaces;" "The Food of Plants," &c.

Of the Boston novels of the year some have been very good, and some rather poor, and some intensely moral, and some slightly immoral productions. Those which have attracted the most attention have been CHARLES READE'S Terrible Temptation, Opportunity and Reginald Archer, by Mrs. ANNE CRAIG, who wrote Emily Chester; PARDON'S Joshua Marvel and Grif, which have won for him the somewhat enviable title of the successor of DICKENS; GEORGE SAND'S Countess Dietrich, The Marquis de Villemer, A Rolling Stone, Handsome Lawrence, The Snow Man, and The Miller of Angibault; Mme. SOPHIE SCHWARTZ'S novels, The Right One, Two Family Mothers, Gold and Name, Birth and Education, Guilt and Innocence, and The Wife of a Twin Man; Behind the Veil; The Lost Dispatch, from the German of FRIEDRICH FRIEDRICH; Six Months Hence and The Member from Paris, Woven of Many Threads, Inn, by "Valerio," or KATHARINE SEDGWICK; GEORGE MACDONALD'S The Vicar's Daughter, Mrs. STOWE'S Pink and White Tyranny, and Mrs. WHITNEY'S Real Folks. The last mentioned, Mrs. WHITNEY'S novel, has had quite a large sale. It has now reached 10,000 and is still selling well.

And the books of poems. Besides LONGFELLOW'S and BRYANT'S, and TENNYSON'S, and BROWNING'S poems, there have been issued from Boston, books of the poems of RICHARD HENRY STODDARD and WILLIAM WINTER, and WILLIAM ALLEN BUTLER, who wrote Nothing to Wear, and CELIA THAXTER, of which WHITTIER writes: "They are unique in many respects; our bleak and rocky New-England sea-coast, the scenery which HARRY FENN'S pencil has so well delineated, all the wonders of atmospherical and sea-change, have, I think, never before been so musically and tenderly sung about;" and of W. H. BURLEIGH, and —— WALT WHITMAN.

The juveniles of the year include some of the best works of writers and artists, for the demands of children are more exacting far than those of the grown folks. There have been Miss ALCOTT'S books, and the others I have already mentioned; the New Year's Bargain, by SUSAN COOLIDGE, a new worker in this field, but a prime one; GRACE GREENWOOD'S charming books, Recollections of My Childhood, History of My Pets, and Stories from Famous Ballads; J. T. TROWBRIDGE'S Jack Hazard and His Fortunes; Mr. DIAZ'S William Henry and His Friends, a continuation of the popular William Henry series; EDWARD EVERETT HALE'S How to Do It; a half dozen new books by OLIVER OPTIC; a like number by ELIZAH KELLOGG; Prof. JAMES DE MILLE'S famous B. O. W. C. series, and a bewildering number of books by Miss MULOCK, Miss ALDRICH, Miss THAXTER, Miss PRESCOTT SPOFFORD, Miss HARRIET BEECHER STOWE, Lewis CARROLL, Mrs. EDGE, D. CHRISTIE, and several others will have to go to the rising tribes, if not to adult readers.

And the gift books. Boston has given the customary attention to this department of books this season, and has succeeded in sending out quite creditable work. Conspicuous are the Hoppin sketch-book, Type and Poems on Land and Sea, by AUGUSTUS HOPPIN, which illustrates by sketches alone the features and the experiences, pleasant and droll, of the European tour; the large quarto illustrating Edwin Booth in Twelve Dramatic Characters, by HERRESHOFF, with descriptive text, a biographical and critical sketch, by WILLIAM WINTER; the quarto illustrated edition of BRET HARTE'S sketches; Mount TE RETZSCH'S Outlines to Shakespeare; The Sermon on the Mount, a noble book, illuminated and chromo-lithographed; PAUL KONEWKA'S Falstaff and His Companions; HAMERTON'S Unknown River, with etchings; the beautiful Good Night and Good Morning; the illustrated coast of Norway, and Miles sketches; an edition of TENNYSON'S Last Tournament, gracefully illustrated by HAMMATT BILLINGS; illustrated Robinson Crusoe, Pilgrim's Progress, and Gulliver's Travels; the new illustrated LONGFELLOW, and the DORE; and the illustrated HUDSON'S SHAKESPEARE. This last is worthy of special mention. Mr. HUDSON is among the very first of Shakespearian scholars, and his rendering has been accepted to a considerable degree. This Holiday edition contains a hundred and twenty steel engravings, and numbers eleven handsome volumes. Also, The Versailles Gallery in sixteen volumes, illustrated with hundreds of engravings of the portraits, paintings, statues, &c., at Versailles; ROBERTS' Holy Land, a large collection of drawings made in Syria, Arabia, Egypt and Nubia; Schiller Gallery, from the original drawings of WILLIAM KAULBACH and others; The Female Characters of Goethe, with numerous steel engravings from the original drawings of KAULBACH.

The largest number of miscellaneous books have been published by OSGOOD & Co.; the smallest and the choicest by ROBERTS BROTHERS and H. O. HOUGHTON & Co., whom New-York knows as HURD & HOUGHTON. The greatest number of juveniles have been published by LEE & SHEPARD, and the latest reproductions or importations from the English have been made by LITTLE, BROWN & Co. The book people are now reaping the reward of their year's industry in the enjoyment of a very satisfactory Holiday trade, notwithstanding the dismal murmurings of a tight money market and approaching bitterly hard times.

The year ends with splendid promises. OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES is hard at work again on new autocrat papers—The Poet at the Breakfast Table—the first of which has already made its appearance, anticipating the opening of the new year; LONGFELLOW and LOWELL will show fresh fruit of their pens in the coming year; BRET HARTE seems to be waking up; THEOPHILUS PARSONS has a new work in press; and RALPH WALDO EMERSON is toiling over his two long-promised works. Certainly the next year, if signs go for anything, will be as notable as this, and early in its opening month the fruit will begin to appear.

THE FINANCES.

The Payment of Dividends in Europe.

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

"Mr. BOUTWELL, the Secretary of the Treasury, in his forthcoming annual report, will strongly recommend that Congress empower the payment in Europe of the interest of the last five per cent. loan." Such is the news brought to us by telegraph from Washington; and we shall look forward with interest to learn upon what grounds such a recommendation is urged. United States stocks are dull in most of the large European Stock Exchanges; the dividends are always paid in America; no one experiences the slightest difficulty in obtaining his dividends, and no one complains of having to send to America for them.

Nearly two years ago I ventured to point out that in funding the debt at a reduced rate of interest no better security could be adopted than the ten-forty bond, for it was then beginning to be known and understood in this country and on the Continent of Europe; and capitalists always show an indisposition to invest in a new security. At that time some $200,000,000 ten-forties had been issued, and as stocks are always more negotiable and therefore more valuable when they exist in very large quantities, it was desirable to increase the volume of the ten-forties and not to interfere with them by bringing out a fresh five per cent. stock in competition with them. Mr. BOUTWELL did not take this view, and he decided to bring out a new stock, and he unfortunately hampered it with a condition which, besides being a novelty is an impediment to its sale—the dividends are made payable quarterly. The natural ultimate extinction of the debt of the United States in Europe and a little consideration as to this class of persons who in Europe hold United States stocks, will speedily prove that a half yearly is much more convenient than a quarterly payment of dividends. It is a troublesome business severing coupons from bonds and preparing them for assortment, and holders of United States stocks do not wish to have their trouble doubled. Had the holders of American stocks been persons of limited income, wholly dependent upon their dividends, it might have been a just boon; but they are bankers, insurance companies and persons who place a small portion of their means in a stock from which they can obtain a better rate of interest than is obtainable from the ordinary stocks of this country. The scrip of the new five per cent. loan has generally been at a discount in London, and when the scrip is fully paid up on the 1st of December next, and it is for the first time placed on the market in competition with the ten-forties, on equal terms, I am quite prepared to see it take a lower place in public estimation. Mr. BOUTWELL apparently anticipates this too, and proposes to confer upon this stock the advantage of receiving dividends in England. If the cost of paying the dividends abroad is to be borne by the foreign stockholder, at his own option, there will be no objection to it; but if the payment abroad is to be made at the expense and at the risk of the Treasury, I think Congress should be well satisfied as to the reasons before sanctioning the scheme. First, a new stock is created which gives more employment in the Treasury than the older and simpler stock; then, to diminish its unsalableness, the Treasury is to be at the cost of subsidizing foreign agents for the payment of dividends. At present a number of banking-houses are engaged in the business of marketing United States coupons, and, on account of the competition, the business is done well and cheaply, but if the Treasury is to appoint its own agents the cost will necessarily be heavy to it. There will be no difficulty in obtaining agents for a commission of only one per cent. The dividends of $130,000,000 of stock amounts to $6,000 per annum.

Why should the United States, whose credit abroad is rising almost daily, resort to such an unusual proceeding for raising the market value of the national debt?

MERCATOR.

LIVERPOOL, Tuesday, Nov. 28, 1871.

A Russian Sword in a Masonic Lodge.

There is now hanging upon the walls of Hudson Lodge No. 7, F. and A. M., of Hudson, Columbia County, (one of the oldest lodges in this country,) a dress sword with a serpentine blade of steel, two feet and nine inches in length, handle heavily plated with gold, and wound with gold chain and surmounted with a Russian eagle, and blended in the blade the motto, "Vivat Catherina." The sword contains, handsomely engraved on the hilt, this inscription: "This sword was presented by the Empress of Russia, in 1809, to Capt. JUDAH PADDOCK, for relieving a Russian man-of-war in distress, as a memorial of honor; and by him to Hudson Lodge No. 7, F. and A. M., in 1809, as a token of his high regard for Masonry."

Monument to Thaddeus Stevens.

The executors of the estate of the late Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS have at last contracted for the erection of a handsome granite monument, with marble tablets, over his grave in Lancaster, Penn. It is understood that their delay in the matter has been occasioned by the opposition that either the colored people of the United States or the public school children of Pennsylvania would raise a memorial to him.

THE ART WORLD.

Among Private Painters—A Visit to Meissonier—A Sketch of the Artist and His Surroundings—The Change of Cavalry—A Magnificent Picture—Musée of Paris—The Winter Studio—A Visit to Cabanel.

From An Occasional Correspondent.

PARIS, Monday, Dec. 4, 1871.

MEISSONIER'S residence is some ten miles from Paris in the pretty village of Poissy, which is reached by the Western Railway. We had made an appointment to visit him and the rainfall has driven us, as we hope to only painted when the light was good, and today he would be more at leisure to receive visitors. Descending at the station, we walked through the quiet village, admiring its quaint buildings and ancient gothic church, and across the wooded square, carpeted with Autumn leaves, to the house of the famous painter. The gate was open, and we entered between grape arbors into a tastefully laid out court. Long buildings, in imitation of the architecture of the time of the HENRIES were to the right, and to the left across a lawn was a mansion with gables and leaded windows in perfect keeping. Our guide knew the ground well, and without ceremony conducted us immediately to the studio, past the stables and a two-story building, from the balcony of which were hanging costumes of all sorts and epochs that had been represented in his paintings, conspicuous among them was the redingote grise. MEISSONIER met us at the door—a man of about fifty years, with a short thick frame, very like the first NAPOLEON he is so fond of representing. He has iron-gray hair, and a full beard, a strong nose and deep set and keen but laughing eyes. He converses in a quick, jovial manner, looking always into the face of the person addressed, and constantly twisting his eye-glass. His studio is on the ground floor, and the entire roof is of glass, screened by a white curtain. The place contains no article of luxury, but is within a work-room. Around the room runs a shelf covered with sketches on panels and half-finished pictures in great numbers; and here one sees the masterly power of the painter—studies and figures of horses upon the bare white wood at a single sitting; wax models of horses on the run, which are studies for the great picture that occupies the end of the room.

"THE CHARGE OF CAVALRY."

This picture, "The Charge of Cavalry," the largest canvas ever painted by MEISSONIER, we had come to see. The canvas is about eight feet long by five high, representing NAPOLEON I. to the left, on the raised ground in the middle distance, seated upon his white horse, with his Generals about him. Beyond, in serried ranks, is the Old Guard. Their forms are innumerable, not over two inches in height, and although they are in the extreme distance, they are finished with the same care one would expect if they were to occupy the foreground. The Emperor, seated calmly upon his charger, raises his triangular chapeau to the troops, who are charging into the picture from the right. How well the moment is represented. The order has been received to charge. The troops are on their mettle. The regular lines are already broken; not one horse is down yet, but all, with lengthened rein and dilated nostril, show the blood of the war-horse as they rush across the foreground. The men are standing in their stirrups and turning toward their Emperor and idol. Naked swords waved on high make a forest of glittering steel, and one easily imagines the cry of "Vive l'Empereur!" from their mouths. They salute their chief, not as on parade, not as military law dictates, but with the hearts and lungs of soldiers who pledged themselves to conquer or die. No blood is yet shed, not a comrade is missing; with a consciousness of success, and under the eye of their Emperor, they dash on to victory. Although the strongest painting and interest is in the foreground, the spectator seems to join with the crowd, and his eye and thought turn with them toward the figure calmly saluting as they pass. The painting has been purchased by Sir RICHARD WALLACE for the sum of two hundred thousand francs.

RUINS OF PARIS.

Another picture on an easel is a striking contrast to the above—the interior of the centre Pavilion of the ruined Palace of the Tuileries. Looking across the débris of fallen masonry, through what was once a window, is seen the the triumphal car of victory in bronze, that still surmounts the Triumphal Arch of the Place du Carrousel. Above, glittering in the sunlight which enters through the roofless palace, are two gilded shields bearing the words Magenta and Solferino—monuments to of past glories.

THE WINTER STUDIO OF PRINCE.

Can we see the Winter studio? It has never been arranged since the Prussians left, but we are kindly permitted to ascend the winding stairs. The white walls of the stairway are penciled over with rough, but masterly sketches. One of a Punch, was evidently sketched before the house was finished, the texture and color of the plaster being enough of a temptation to try a crayon upon it. The reason has left it in finishing, so that it is now stained in white. Here we saw the study of the painting of 1814. For the sketch of NAPOLEON I., MEISSONIER sat himself on horseback, before a large mirror put in the snow one Winter's day, and painted upon the saddle before him. We saw here also a picture of a concert, with several ladies around a piano. We had never seen a picture composed entirely of females, and had heard it said he never painted them. I have my doubts if this one will ever be finished. It was evidently commenced years ago.

A PAINTER'S FANCY.

Our host assured us we had some time before our train left, and he would show us a "nest" he had built for his son. We followed across the orchard and through a little gate to a house modeled by himself. It has been several years in construction, and still they are at work on the finish. One room in particular is striking—a kind of conservatory or smoking room, with lattice windows on three sides, and on the fourth a large, open fire-place. We repeated the father's words as we entered the chamber—"the nest"—for the bed was curtained with cretonne, as were also the walls, ceiling and doors; a baby's crib and some neglected toys were in a corner. We turned and congratulated the grandfather. At the station, with much hand-shaking, many thanks and compliments, we said adieu, and steamed past the many ruined villas back to the city. We asked our guide if MEISSONIER was not troubled by visitors, as his time was so valuable. In answer to our question, he replied that one day a gentleman presented himself as a painter, and asked permission to visit his studio. "With pleasure," was the response. "I am a professor also, and have a dozen of my young lady pupils outside whom I should be happy to bring in." "Certainly, certainly, show them around the garden," was the reply.

A VISIT TO CABANEL.

CABANEL was to receive, but on his receiving our cards we were admitted. We were left to await him in a little ante-room, furnished with antique furniture, and the walls were entirely covered with photographs and engravings, reproductions of his own works. While we were examining these, a step was heard, the portiere was thrust aside, and CABANEL entered. We were asked if it would trouble us to see a model on the hill, which we assured him it would not, and we passed through the curtained door into the studio, which is hung with tapestries. On these are sketches, studies, and the first conceptions of new famous paintings. In the corner, on an easel, a full-length portrait of the Countess de B., commenced in crinoline, as it is said the old masters commenced their pictures. It is majestically drawn and freely-handled with here and there a faint suggestion of color, making the painting very agreeable although in an unfinished state. CABANEL was at work upon a reproduction of his famous painting of "The Birth of Venus," and intended for a gentleman of New York. He assured us it was the last he should paint, although he changed each somewhat from the original, as it did not please him to repeat a subject. The original idea of this painting is a decoration in the anagrium at the Countess DE M——, in the Place Vendôme, where CABANEL painted a plafond of the ceiling. Over the doors are the elements, and this figure floating on the sea represents water. Apart this came the life-size canvas which was exhibited in the Great Exhibition of 1867, and is now to be seen at the Luxembourg Palace, having been saved from the Tuileries. The reproduction, about two-thirds the original size, was painted for the engraving. It was taken to New-York by Mr. DERBY, and is now owned in Philadelphia. Seen there still on a third in New-York. During the less we CABANEL painted several portraits of Americans of Fortune, and he is now occupied with a portrait of a distinguished Bostonian.

LADING OF ROUSSEAU.

GOUPIL will soon publish another engraving by ROUSSEAU, of a picture by the master, representing a wooden landing a white horse to her breast. The head is in profile, and has a sweet and modest expression that can be rendered capitally in an engraving. H. R.

INDIA.

Execution of the Assassin of the Late Chief-Justice.

The Calcutta Englishman of Nov. 6 gives the following account of the execution of ABDULLAH, the assassin of the late Chief-Justice NORMAN: "The murderer of the late Chief-Justice paid the penalty of his crime on Saturday morning. For some days past he had been suffering from severe illness, and it is possible that his execution was carried out at once, lest he should by a natural death have escaped the disgrace and punishment awarded to him. It is probable that it was not generally known through the native quarters of the town that the day or hour had been fixed for his execution, or a larger concourse of spectators would have been present. As it was, some few hundred Hindus, but hardly a dozen Mahommedans, were present. The number of European on the ground was not large, but it contained some of the softer sex, if these could be so designated, whom nobody expected to see at such a place. A large force of European and native constables kept the ground, but there was no disorder, no noise, no excitement among the crowd. On the fatal morning, a little before 8 o'clock, Dr. MACKENZIE, the Superintendent of the Jail, accompanied by Dr. LYNCH, Inspector-General of Prisons; Mr. S. C. BAYLEY, Secretary to the Government of Bengal, Mr. CHAUNTRELL, Solicitor to Government, and the representative of the Press, proceeded to the condemned cell. The prisoner remained on his knees for some time in prayer. He was then brought out, and handcuffed and pinioned. He looked very ill, and as his wrists were being locked to the handcuff behind his back, he began to display the usual symptoms of nervousness which he had shown since his capture. His demeanor had never been defiant or bold, but always calm and self-possessed. Even when informed, which he had been previously, that his body was to be burned after death—punishment dreaded by the followers of the Prophet, as involving the loss of the means of the most cool, and merely said, 'Alake.' Before ascending the steps which led up to the scaffold, Dr. MACKENZIE asked him if he wished to say anything. He answered that he had nothing to say beyond what he had already said, that he was not the assassin, but had stabbed the Chief-Justice; he was subject to fits (epilepsy) and he must have done the act when in one of it. He had always kept to this statement, and though not a little trouble was taken during the time he was in prison to collect something more from him, all attempts were fruitless. He had evidently made up his mind for death, and as Mr. Justice PAUL anticipated in delivering sentence, he was determined to carry his dark secret with him to his grave. Whether the knowledge that his body would be burned unnerved him at the last, it is impossible to say; but his voice, in replying to Dr. MACKENZIE, was very weak and trembling, and there was a nervous twitching in his hands which showed that he was not altogether without assistance, however, up the steps leading to the roof, on which the scaffold was erected; but when his eyes rested on the domes who were waiting to receive him, a visible shudder passed through his body, and a strange look of anger and horror shot from his eyes. From that moment to the moment of death he remained standing on the trap of the scaffold while the cap was drawn over his face and the rope adjusted about his neck. The latter had hardly been done when he fell down suddenly, but in a slanting position, probably in a faint. At that moment, however, the bolt was drawn, and he fell through the trap. The rope was a long one; but he never stopped. The hand his ear to the beat of his heart, and this perhaps tended to prevent him dying almost immediately. He struggled for some little time, and the doctors at first thought that the drop had failed to break the neck. It was found, however, when the body was cut down, that the neck had been broken. It was exactly 8 o'clock, and after being suspended for about an hour, the body was cut down and taken inside the jail. After inspection by the doctors, it was taken to the back of

Departure of the Florida from St. Thomas—Action of the Spanish Cruisers—Satisfactory Solution—The Hornet Case Regarded as Settled.

ST. THOMAS, Dec. 16, via HAVANA, Dec. 22.—The telegraph steamer Intercontinent has arrived from England, and gone to Jamaica to lay the new Aspinwall cable. The United States steamer Shenandoah has arrived from Saguana for the purpose of examining her guns. The Anglo-Saxon steamer Florida, after having detached her screw, started under sail for New-York on the 14th inst. The Spanish man-of-war Vasco de Nunez immediately followed the Florida, fired a blank cartridge, overhauled her and examined her papers, which were found to be correct, and the Florida proceeded on her voyage. The steamer Alpha, from Halifax, on her last voyage refused to discharge the twelve days' quarantine imposed upon vessels from that port, and left without being allowed to land her cargo. Twelve days' quarantine has been established upon vessels from New-York. The United States steamer Hassler, with Prof. AGASSIZ on board has arrived at St. Thomas from Boston.

ST. JOHN, Dec. 16, via HAVANA, Dec. 22.—Quarantine has been established on vessels from Nova Scotia.

JACMEL, Dec. 6, via HAVANA, Dec. 22.—The case of the steamer Hornet is considered settled. The Spanish man-of-war Zaragoza remained two days off Port-au-Prince without communicating with the shore. The Commander then sent a dispatch to the Government asking if the Spanish Consul could enjoy the same guarantees as heretofore, and if such was the case the Consul would land again. The Government replied in the affirmative, and the Consul landed and recognized his post. It is reported that the Commander of the Zaragoza asked the Government to remove some important pieces of machinery from the Hornet, thus rendering her unfit for use; but the Government refused, and the Zaragoza sailed for Santiago de Cuba, where she has since arrived. It is stated that Spanish vessels will remain at Port-au-Prince until the Hornet question is settled by the Washington and Madrid Governments. President SALNAVE has arrived at Port-au-Prince.

SAN DOMINGO, Dec. 12, via HAVANA, Dec. 22.—President BAEZ had returned to the capital. Engagements have taken place between the Baez troops and the revolutionists. CAPRAL was beaten at Hiebe, and compelled to abandon the place hastily. His loss was heavy in men and ammunition. He lost even his own clothing. Gen. PIMENTAL reduced the attack of the Baez forces successfully at Santo Esan, and routed them.

VENEZUELA.

The Revolutionists Preparing for a Final Struggle—An Embassy to Caracas.

CURACOA, Dec. 8, via HAVANA, Dec. 22.—Affairs throughout Venezuela remain unchanged. BLANCO, with 4,000 men, is in the interior operating against the revolutionists, who are retiring before the President, and are preparing for a final struggle.

Great excitement was caused here a week previous by the arrest of the Attorney-General by order of the Government. The arrest gave rise to a demonstration by the people. Troops were called out and fired upon the crowd, killing one person and wounding nineteen. The action of the Government causes much dissatisfaction among the people. The trouble arose from personal enmity between the Attorney-General and the Governor.

THE PACIFIC SLOPE.

Before the California Senatorship Matters—The California Senatorship—Wrecks—Indian Threats Against the Union Pacific.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 18.—Heavy rains with high winds have been prevailing throughout the State. The Commissioner has commenced proceedings to wind up the People's Insurance Company, which has been declared bankrupt. The counsel for FARWELL & Co., and other policy-holders, have commenced proceedings against the Pacific Insurance Company, which will necessitate the closing of its affairs at any sacrifice, and which, it is believed, will result in reducing the amount which the policy-holders would have received had the directors been permitted to manage the assets. The Union Insurance Company has paid silk and the Firemen's nearly all its assessments.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 19.—It is the Occidental Insurance Company, of this city, which—having insured all its outstanding policies in the Commercial Union Assurance Company, of London—will retire from business, after settling its Chicago losses at fifty cents on the dollar.

The Democratic Legislative Caucus nominated Judge W. F. WALLACE for United States Senator. Hon. A. A. SARGENT will be elected today.

A rain-storm has raged furiously since Sunday evening. The fall of rain in thirty-six hours was 5 56-100 inches. The steamer Salinda was burned at Point Pedro and a total loss. A vessel, which caught on to her bottom up, was seen off Gold Bluffs. She is supposed to be the bark Lone Jackson, from Portland. The Shoshonee Indians, of Nevada, have been summoned to ride free on the Central Pacific Railroad freight-trains. On Sunday last a number of them, including three Chiefs, insisted on riding on a passenger train, but the train went off and left them. The Indians now threaten to tear up the track, and it is feared they will.

Election of Mr. Sargent as the United States Senate From California.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 20.—AARON A. SARGENT was elected United States Senator by a joint convention of the Legislature today, by a strict party vote, as follows: SARGENT, 175; WALLACE, Democrat, 46. The rain continues here.

Threatened Floods in California—Heavy Rains.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 20.—Rains are exceedingly heavy throughout the State. The telegraph lines are down in all directions, and no railroad trains are running. There are floods in many localities. The lower part of San José has been flooded, and many houses have been washed away. At Sacramento the American River is rising rapidly. Putah Creek rose twenty-nine feet in ten hours. The average rain-fall in the State is already greater than last year. At San Francisco the rain-fall since Sunday evening is 2.65 inches. Additional rivers are already named. The thermometer stands at 70°.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 21.—The rain-storm has abated. The valley country of California is badly flooded, and considerable damage has been done. Four men were drowned by the breaking of a dam belonging to the North Bloomfield Mining Company in Nevada County, and much damage otherwise was done.

SAN FRANCISCO, Dec. 20.—There is great excitement in Arizona over the news that the Government has decided to follow a firm course, drive the Apaches upon a reservation, and keep them there.

RAILROAD ACCIDENT.

A Train to Indiana Thrown off the Track—Three Men Killed and Fifteen Wounded.

INDIANAPOLIS, Ind., Dec. 20.—The mail-train bound west on the Cincinnati and Indianapolis Junction Railroad, due here at 1:30 P. M., was thrown from the track by a broken rail, about five miles east of Morristown, Ind. The engine and train ran about thirty yards after they left the track, until it struck a bridge where they were hurled over a distance of fifteen feet, the engine falling on one side of the bridge and the cars on the other. JAMES HAMILTON, engineer, M. B. PERKINS, conductor, and J. KILMANY, foreman of that section, were killed. L. CALDWIN, baggage-master, and DAN. HASSETT, train man, were severely injured, and some twenty passengers more or less injured. Conductor FLEMING and KILMANY, the section foreman, were in the baggage-car at the time of the accident. The former was killed by the express safe and the latter by the stove falling on him.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

Failure of the Resolution to Impeach Gov. Scott.

COLUMBIA, S. C., Dec. 20.—Gov. SCOTT, with a view of preventing the postponement of a vote on his impeachment, sent a message to the Legislature this morning, containing a proclamation convening that body in extraordinary session at noon to-morrow. The Governor's supporters then pressed a vote on a motion to strike out the enacting clause of the impeachment resolution. The motion was finally carried at 1 o'clock—yeas 63, nays 32. This defeats the impeachment. Then came another proclamation from the Governor, revoking the proclamation issued a few hours previously, and the Legislature at 3 o'clock, in pursuance of the concurrent resolution passed last week, adjourned until Jan. 8.

THE MUSCOVITE.

Recognizance of the Grand Duke Alexis from the Canadian Shores—His Future Movements.

NIAGARA FALLS, Dec. 22.—The Grand Duke ALEXIS and suite arrived at Clifton, Canada, at 2 o'clock this afternoon. He was received by the civil and military authorities and escorted by Col. SIDNEY BARNEY, with the Forty-fourth Canadian Volunteers, around the Canadian side of the Falls, including the Museum and under the Horseshoe Falls. The Prince appeared to be impressed by the grandeur of the Falls in their Winter dress. The party crossed the new suspension bridge at a o'clock P. M., and took quarters at the Bonner House, where rooms had been prepared for them in magnificent style. The Grand Duke will remain quiet at the hotel until morning, when, after viewing the scenery on the American side of the Falls, he will leave for Buffalo in a Pullman palace car over the Central Railroad at 2¼ P. M.

BUFFALO, Dec. 22.—The Grand Duke and suite will arrive here by special train over the Central Railroad at 4½ P. M. to-morrow. He will be received at the depot by Ex-President FILLMORE, Hon. WM. G. FARGO and MYRON P. BUSH, on behalf of the Buffalo Club, and escorted to his rooms at the TIFT House. A grand reception will be given at the Club-rooms in the evening. Sunday will be spent quietly at the hotel. On Monday the party will look about the city, and be entertained by private citizens. A delegation from Milwaukee presented an address at the Falls this afternoon, tendering the hospitalities of that city, which were accepted. The Grand Duke will reach Milwaukee Jan. 2, and remain until Jan. 4.

CHICAGO, Dec. 22.—A dispatch was received from the Grand Duke ALEXIS today, saying that he will arrive here on Saturday, the 30th inst., and will remain until Tuesday, when he will proceed to Milwaukee.

ST. LOUIS, Mo., Dec. 22.—A dispatch from Mr. CATACAZY says the Grand Duke ALEXIS will arrive here on Friday, Jan. 5.

UTAH.

Trial of the Alleged Murderers of Dr. Robinson—The Mormon Endowment House—Brigham Young's Case.

SALT LAKE CITY, Utah, Dec. 21.—Mrs. ROBINSON, widow of the murdered Dr. ROBINSON, is expected here to-morrow from San Francisco, to testify in the examination of the alleged assassins of her husband. It is stated that eighteen persons passed through the secret initiation ceremonies of the Mormon Endowment House, on last Monday night. ROBERT H. BASKIN, late Acting United States District-Attorney, has been employed by the Attorney-General of the United States to assist in the prosecutions against BRIGHAM YOUNG, WELLS STOUT and others.

THE WHARTON CASE.

Close of the Case for Prosecution—Two Colored Witnesses to be Called.

ANNAPOLIS, Dec. 22.—The Court met at 10 o'clock. State-Attorney REVALL stated to the Court that the remaining witnesses for the prosecution had been summoned, but were not present. Dr. WILLIAM T. HOWARD, whom they were very anxious to examine, was ill. The prosecution also stated in reply to a question of the Court that they would close the case for the State, excepting as to the further examination of Prof. TOWEY, unless the Court would consent to wait a little while longer. Mr. STEELE, of the counsel for the defense, stated that they wished to be understood as not assenting to such arrangement. After further consultation the State rested the case except as to TOWEY, and the Court adjourned until 1½ P. M. Tuesday. In the meantime it is understood that the counsel will arrange to have two colored servants of Mrs. WHARTON examined, neither side accrediting the witnesses to the jury.

FIRES.

Dry Goods Stores in Binghamton Burned—Destruction of a Mail and Baggage-Car—Other Fires.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., Dec. 22.—J. N. HINE & Co.'s, and E. P. SIMSON & SON'S dry goods stores on Court-street were burned this morning. The damage to the stores and other property in the block is about $44,000.

FORT WAYNE, Ind., Dec. 22.—BEAVER, MILLER & Co.'s planing mill, CUMER & Co.'s chair factory and several barns and one dwelling, were totally destroyed by fire this morning. The loss is nearly $80,000; insurance about $30,000, mostly in foreign companies. Water was scarce, and owing to the extreme cold weather, the firemen were unable to do much.

TERRE HAUTE, Ind., Dec. 22.—A car containing the mails, express matter and baggage, on the morning train from Indianapolis to this city by the Vandalia line, took fire from a stove at Seeleyville. The car, with its contents, express, mails and baggage, were entirely consumed.

The Virginia Legislature and the State Debt—Adjournment for the Holidays.

RICHMOND, Va., Dec. 22.—The House passed today a concurrent resolution suspending the payment of interest on the State debt, due the 1st of January. Pending consideration, the same resolution was passed in the Senate. The House also passed a resolution unanimously declaring it to be the purpose of the State to discharge so just obligation, but at the same time reserving to herself the power of reviewing, or if necessary, of repealing the Funding bill. Both Houses have adjourned to January 2, 1872.

WASHINGTON NEWS.

Process of Carrying Out the Civil Service Reforms.

Efforts to Get up Gold Sensations—Story of a Lost Book—Business in Congress—Canal Steam Navigation—Miscellaneous.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 22.—The civil service regulations, which are to go into effect after Jan. 1, are receiving more discussion than when first made public. The heads of bureaus in the several Departments, who have had the selection of subordinates, and who have been more annoyed by the pressure for clerkships and promotions than by the actual labor of their offices, are generally rejoiced and agree that the new rules will give them better men than the present system. Some of those who have claimed to be civil service reformers seem delighted at what they term a great political blunder. They think the active politicians and the people will be opposed to the scheme, and will in consequence fight against the President's renomination. There are many politicians who distrust the success of any attempt to destroy the influence of patronage, and will yield only because they have to. An objection made by some who are determined to find fault is that the tenure is not fixed by the rules. The reply of the Commission is that this point was one that received special consideration by them. The evils likely to result from a fixed tenure were evident. They decided that any system that should prevent removals for political reasons, or any other abuse of the removing power, was sufficient; and this is secured in the manner of determining appointments. Removals would not probably be made for political reasons when there could be no assurance that a new appointment would secure an officer of the desired political character, the basis of this theory being that removals are in most cases made for no other reason than to make places for particular persons that it is desired to appoint. The commissioners of the members expired with the presentation of their report to the President, but he immediately informed them that he desired their services and advice in putting the rules they had framed into practice. The Commission will, therefore, become an advisory Board. The Board will first form the officers of the whole service into groups, those being in one group whose duties are similar. Whoever enters one of these groups will enter at the lowest grade, and vacancies in a group above the lowest grade will be filled by promotions within that group. In the Departments here, for the most part, each bureau will form one group. The Agricultural Department will form one, the New-York Custom-house will form one, the Boston Custom-house another, and so on. The Board will then arrange for the proper examinations within each group, and the examinations will bear proper relations to the duties to be performed. In the case of the minor customs and other offices where grouping is impracticable, competition will, in cases of vacancies, be opened at once to the public. At any time, when an officer has doubts of the capacity of one of his subordinates, it will be competent to send him before the Examining Board, to compete with others for the position he now holds. When the system is fairly in operation, the worthless material that may be found in any of the Departments will gradually but not slowly disappear, without such a panic being produced as would result from any sweeping application of examinations to all those now employed in the Departments.

GOLD OPERATORS' SENSATIONS.

Financial operators here, astonished at the success of the Administration in reducing the premium on gold, are said to be preparing for a manipulation of the markets so as to produce an advance to old prices, and for this purpose are circulating bogasse stories about Cuban complications.

THE LOST BOOK.

The true story of the loss of a copy of the case of the United States before the Geneva Tribunal is no secret, and may as well be told, to go along with the nonsensical and sensational paragraphs which have been set afloat. It was lost on H-street, between the Arlington Hotel and Sixteen and a half-street. Mr. EVARTS and Mr. FISH were in a carriage together, and it was dropped by them. They knew it was in the carriage while they were passing the hotel, and when they missed it at the last-named place they turned back immediately and made search for the volume. Within the distance of the block and a half, where they knew they lost it, it could not be found. They had not, in riding over the distance, one street-car and two market-wagons, and no one else could have passed along the same street till the search was made. Of course there was a good deal of anxiety about it for a while, and proper efforts were made to discover its whereabouts, but without success. It was believed that the driver of one of the market-wagons had picked it up, and, entirely ignorant of its nature, had done with it just what he would with any other volume. Whatever become of it, there are facts which render it pretty certain that it was not used in any manner adverse to the interest of our Government. These simple facts are the only foundation for romances published or to be published, all else being pure fiction.

COTTON SALES DURING THE WAR.

On the reassembling of Congress Representative SLOSS, of Alabama, will introduce a resolution asking for information regarding the purchase and sale of cotton within the rebel lines during the war, and the sale of captured cotton in 1866 and 1867. If the records of the Department do not contradict in a satisfactory manner the allegations of fraud in these transactions now in his possession, Mr. SLOSS will move for an investigation.

A FRESH CROP OF RAILROAD GRANTS.

From present indications it is certain that immediately on the reassembling of Congress a new batch of land-grant railroad bills will be presented in the House, among which will be several for the building of roads in the Southern States, particularly in Mississippi and Alabama, in both of which States there are large tracts of Government lands now lying idle.

THE HOLIDAYS.

For the first time in the history of the Government, the several Executive Departments have agreed upon rules regarding clerical labor during the Holidays. The regulations of each have heretofore been independent of the others, but at the Cabinet meeting today it was decided that all the employes of the Government under their direct control in this city should be allowed to leave their respective duties at noon to-morrow, to resume them on Tuesday morning of next week, and that the New-Year's Holiday shall commence on Saturday morning, the 30th inst., and continue until Tuesday, the 2d prox.

CANAL STEAM NAVIGATION.

The class of inventions in which the business of the Patent Office shows most activity, is for the propulsion of canal-boats by steam without injury to the banks of the canals. This activity has been greatly stimulated by the prize which the State of New-York has offered for a practical attainment of that object. A great number and variety of models have been presented, constructed on all sorts of theories, and with varying ingenuity. There appears to be little confidence in the success of any of these inventions, except by the inventors, each one of whom is certain that his machine when tried will stand the test.

POSTAGE TO THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The Postal Convention with the Argentine Republic, the terms of which were published some time ago, has been ratified by both Governments, and instructions for carrying it into operation will soon be published. It establishes, for the first time, a direct mail with that Republic and a uniform rate of postage.

THE TREASURY FRAUDS.

The cases of the Government against JOHNSON and MADDEN, the defaulting Treasury clerks, will soon be brought to trial and speedily disposed of. JOHNSON, it is believed, will not attempt to withstand the evidence against him, and will enter a plea of guilty. In the case of MADDEN there is an opportunity to set up the claim that he is not guilty, on the ground that he got the money through JOHNSON, and could not have obtained it himself otherwise. Whether his counsel will advise him to stand trial or plead guilty is yet unknown.

THE CITY CHAMBERLAIN.

Mr. Bradley's Reply to Controller Green—Defense of His Official Conduct.

NEW-YORK, Dec. 21, 1871.

Andrew H. Green, Esq., Controller of the City of New-York:

SIR: In acknowledging your favor of the 18th inst., I have the honor to say that I would have been surprised at its unjust tone if I did not see that you are obviously addressing yourself to the public rather than to me. I need not remind you that the accounts and clerks in my office are accessible to you or to any citizen at any time. Indeed the information for which you ask is already as much a part of the official records of the Controller's office as it is of the Chamberlain's office. Assuming, therefore, that you desire to transmit my reply also to the Press for the further instruction of the public regarding the Chamberlain's office, I submit it with all due respect.

As to your assumption that the interest upon the public moneys has been claimed by myself or my predecessor as the property of the Chamberlain, it is, I think, sufficient to say that the entire amount of such income has been duly deposited monthly to the credit of the City, deducting only the necessary expenses, and to the aggregate amount of $415,128 49. As follows:

Amount paid by Peter B. Sweeny	$119,401 23
Amount paid by John J. Bradley	295,721 76
Total	$415,122 99

It is personally of no interest to me how these moneys shall be drawn or disposed of so long as my duty to the public as one of its officers and the legal responsibility of my bonds are duly considered and respected. The exact amount of the City and County moneys deposited for safe-keeping with me is always appear on my books, ready for any legally-drawn warrant without diminution, increase, or other chance, until each appropriation is exhausted. The interest which may accrue cannot be practically regulated by law, or treated as you desire. The rate of interest is liable to fluctuation, and must necessarily be a subject for the exercise of a judicious discretion. The deposits and the interests thereon are essentially separate matters, and cannot be merged in each other without confusion. The one is always ready for any proper draft against the several legal appropriations. The other is a revenue or rental which the banks pay for the privilege of holding the public funds on deposit. By agreement with the Chamberlain, personally, during a great part of the present year the ruling rate of interest in the money market was so depressed as to threaten a necessity for serious reduction in the rates realized on the City deposits, and even at one time to bring under discussion the necessity of my suspending all interest returns except the minimum of six per cent. provided for by the statute of 1866. Although I have been fortunate in securing about four per cent., it does not follow that such a rate, or any other, can be permanently fixed and relied upon.

The general statutes regulating the duties of County Treasurer in the State, make no provisions for interest on public moneys, and the practice in other counties has been to make no return of interest. The special laws defining the duties of Chamberlain and County Treasurer in the County were passed at a time when the same practice prevailed here. For thirty years preceding the term of my immediate predecessor, to whom you allude, not one dollar of the interest on the City deposits was ever accounted for. The practice was justly inaugurated by him. The law still simply provides that the office rent and clerk hire of the Chamberlain shall be paid by the banks, and there is no other provision for these expenses, nor with regard to the interest in any shape.

The charter creating the Chamberlain as the head of a Bureau in the Finance Department, but provides that he shall be appointed by the Mayor. His duties as County Treasurer (an office created under the Constitution of the State) separate him still more distinctly from other heads of bureaus in your Department, as indicated by the amount of his bonds, requiring a justification altogether in the sum of $1,000,000, or a penalty in the sum of $2,000,000 to the people of the State, as County Treasurer, and $2,000,000 to the City, as Chamberlain; while the amount of bonds required of the Controller himself is only in the sum of $50,000. The law regulating the pay and appointment of my subordinates, as alluded to in your letter, says in terms, (section 23, chapter 325, laws of 1866:) "The banks in which such deposits shall be made, shall pay, proportionately to the monthly balances in each, the office rent of the said Chamberlain, the salaries to be fixed by him of his clerks and a deputy Chamberlain, all of whom the said Chamberlain is hereby authorized to appoint and dismiss." The general terms of the charter of 1870 defining the power of the Controller, cannot be held to have been intended to abrogate this law. The statutes, as admitted in your communication, must be read together, and hence my right to regulate my office by the appointment of my subordinates as indicated in the words of the statute. In view of the large security required from me, it is clearly the purpose of the law to fasten responsibility on me personally, which you could not transfer to subordinates of your creation without releasing my sureties from all legal liability.

I fail to see how the accruing interest on "the average daily balances" in bank, can be legally distributed by the banks on the account of the several appropriations as you suggest. The interest does not accrue upon "average daily balances," as you say, but necessarily in the words of the statute, it at all, by monthly returns on the balances in each bank, as implied in regard to the provision for the Chamberlain's report of the precise amount of interest. Each day must be regarded as a variable sum, necessarily, which should not derange the exact amounts of the legal appropriations. When ascertained and reported by me it may be property regulated and disposed of. I presume the present mode of treating it is criticized, really, with a view to influencing its constitutional adjudication in some case, and I reply to your commanding request, as to the expenses of my office, will be my best answer to this point also.

I have to say, therefore, that there are not, nor have there at any time been, any persons employed by the Chamberlain, or in his office in any capacity, who do not labor faithfully for their salaries. My clerical assistants have been all there posts for many years, and some have grown old in the service of my predecessors. I have made no appointments or removals. No disbursements are made for any purpose, except for necessary advertising, postage, &c. A detailed statement of my expenses is herewith transmitted as already published in the daily Press, together with comments regarding the character and qualifications of the clerks intrusted with the discharge of duties in this office.

The following-named gentlemen I found in the discharge of their various trusts when I assumed office:

H. A. OVINGTON, Trust Account Clerk and Secretary, has held his office over sixteen years. He was for several years Chief Clerk in the United States Loan Office, connected with the late United States Bank; afterward, for a few years, in stock and exchange business in the firm of OVINGTON & LIVINGSTON. His official bond is for $200,000.

WM. B. ROCKWELL, City and County Book-keeper, has been book-keeper for several commercial houses, has held several positions of trust; his present position eight years.

GODFREY W. LEAKE, Interest Clerk, was cashier of the People's Bank for many years, is a trained fiscal expert of over thirty years' bank experience; has held his present position six years.

DANIEL WEAKE, City Pay-master, formerly Pay-master in the United States Navy, with creditable record during the war; has held his present position four years.

JAMES BRICE, assistant clerk and messenger.

BRYAN GAUGHAN, watchman.

PETER KANE, policeman.

FOREFATHERS' DAY.

Commemoration of the Landing of the Pilgrim Fathers.

Annual Dinner of the New-England Society—Addresses by Joseph H. Choate, Ex-Gov. Jewell, Ex-Gov. Hawley, Wm. M. Evarts and Others.

The sixty-sixth anniversary of the New-England Society, and the two hundred and fifty-first of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, was celebrated last evening, at Delmonico's. Dinner commenced at 7 o'clock, when about 400 persons were present. Mr. JOSEPH H. CHOATE presided. Among those present were Messrs. William M. Evarts, Ex-Collector Murphy, Isaac H. Bailey, Gen. McDowell, Ex-Gov. Jewell, Ex-Gov. Hawley, George Jones, Rev. Henry Ward Beecher, Rev. Dr. Beecher, Rev. Cotton Smith, D. T. McMahon.

Dinner having been partaken of, the Chairman, in proposing the first toast, said: "If, in rising for the last time to discharge the arduous duties of this Chair, I should fail to recall the memory of those many happy anniversaries at which we have worshiped at the shrine of the Pilgrim Fathers, and thank you from the bottom of my heart for the overwhelming kindnesses you have always showered upon me, I should, indeed, be ungrateful. It is now seven years since, by the untimely departure of one of your most distinguished Presidents, his mantle descended upon my shoulders, and during that period, with the exception of a single occasion, you have submitted to my stern authority [laughter] and have manifested an unbounded sympathy with those melancholy emotions, the contemplation of which the Pilgrim Fathers have always inspired. [Laughter.] Physiologists have shown us that once in seven years physical man entirely changes his structure, and in that sense, at least, I may modestly declare that I have expended the last drop of my blood, [great laughter,] the last fibre of my nerve in the service of my country and of the New-England Society. [Continued laughter.] Inexorable time, whose noiseless tread and whose gnawing tooth, spare neither President—nor as I see, the clergy—has laid a silent finger upon me, [laughter,] and I am fated to join the numerous caravan of Ex-Presidents. That is one reason why my retirement fills you [laughter.] Another is that I have of late fallen more under the professional discipline of my own worthy pastor, and he has been tendering me resignation. [Laughter.] He told me that I was rapidly approaching that age when, as the poet says every man must become either a fool or a physician, [laughter,] and as I could not possibly become the latter, he quite became the knew of my becoming the former was to become more serious minded, to give up those frivolities, to remember whose parishioner I was [laughter] what was the number of my pew, and to think of the sterner and soberer duties of life. These circumstances and many others I will forbear to detail, as they might lead to the unfavorable conclusion to retire from the honors of the chair. I am happy, however, to think that this mantle is to fall upon no unworthy shoulders, that your choice has fallen upon one already distinguished in many similar fields, who has served the interests of his country at home and abroad, and who always ready to come to the rescue any service in the good old cause. [Applause.] I know you are aware he possesses all the qualities of heart and head that will enable him faithfully to discharge the duties of this office, whether he possesses in full the perfect measure of that organ which is put to the test more frequently in the discharge of your functions I mean the stomach. [Laughter.] I can assure him that the success of the Chair depended far more upon that organ than upon the other two. I remember the brilliant and memorable administration of GRINNELL, and the shorter, but not less brilliant, career of EVARTS. [Laughter.] And whatever credit has fallen to my own unworthy efforts, I can assure him that it is dependent not so much upon the exercise of the mental faculties or the impulses of the heart, but rather that they owed their triumph to superior gastric-juice. [Great laughter.] If he can preserve his stomach in perfect order, I can promise him a long and brilliant administration. [Laughter.] And now you will, I was sure you would turn out in strength at my funeral. [Laughter.] and I can say I never saw a more respectable set of men than we have here to-night. [Laughter.] I see from your down-cast visages and your drooping eyes that the grief of this separation is mutual. [Continued laughter.] Let me assure you, gentlemen, that even the vanity of a retiring President may be pardoned. I have endeavored to do my duty. [Laughter.] I have endeavored to see that the internal and foreign policy of the Society was properly administered. Internally my great aim has been to make you contented with yourselves—a most difficult task always when you talk to the genuine New-Englander, to bring him to a condition of self-satisfaction; to take that diffident, shy and shrinking individual by the hand, [laughter,] and to persuade him, by argument, by entreaty and by encouragement, that after all he is equally as good as the rest of mankind. [Laughter.] The fulfillment of my portion of this task assures me of success. [Laughter.] And then to our external duties, I am happy to report that I leave them all in the main in a very satisfactory position. One chair I am sorry to see is not represented here to-night, but I can explain [laughter.] Another is that I have of late fallen more under the professional discipline of my own worthy pastor, and he has been tendering me resignation. [Laughter.] He told me that I was rapidly approaching that age when, as the poet says every man must become either a fool or a physician, [laughter,] and as I could not possibly become the latter, he quite became the knew of my becoming the former was to become more serious minded, to give up those frivolities, to remember whose parishioner I was [laughter] what was the number of my pew, and to think of the sterner and soberer duties of life. These circumstances and many others I will forbear to detail, as they might lead to the unfavorable conclusion to retire from the honors of the chair. I am happy, however, to think that this mantle is to fall upon no unworthy shoulders, that your choice has fallen upon one already distinguished in many similar fields, who has served the interests of his country at home and abroad, and who always ready to come to the rescue any service in the good old cause. [Applause.] I know you are aware he possesses all the qualities of heart and head that will enable him faithfully to discharge the duties of this office, whether he possesses in full the perfect measure of that organ which is put to the test more frequently in the discharge of your functions I mean the stomach. [Laughter.] I can assure him that the success of the Chair depended far more upon that organ than upon the other two. I remember the brilliant and memorable administration of GRINNELL, and the shorter, but not less brilliant, career of EVARTS. [Laughter.] And whatever credit has fallen to my own unworthy efforts, I can assure him that it is dependent not so much upon the exercise of the mental faculties or the impulses of the heart, but rather that they owed their triumph to superior gastric-juice. [Great laughter.] If he can preserve his stomach in perfect order, I can promise him a long and brilliant administration. [Laughter.] And now you will.

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM.

The Debate For on Week Concluded.

A MOMENTOUS CHANGE.

From the Boston Daily Advertiser.

In this matter, by all odds the most revolutionary and momentous change in our administrative system about which the people are seriously concerned, everything depended upon the Chief Executive. The Attorney-General, on points submitted by the Commission, had held that Congress could not by legislation compel the President to choose any defined limitation of his official discretion under the Constitution in making appointments to office. The President's counsel also did not hesitate to proclaim, after this opinion, that reform was hopeless, because in these times no possible President, least of all Gen. GRANT, would voluntarily relinquish the immense influence conferred by the party patronage. But the President has done it, and done it with a promptness, a heartiness and a courageous determination which will make effectual opposition impossible.

CREDIT FOR THE PRESIDENT.

Worcester Spy.

The credit of this reform is largely due to the President. He has recommended it repeatedly in his messages to Congress; the act authorizing the Commission which has just reported was passed in compliance with his recommendations; he appointed the Commissioners, selecting for that purpose some of the most intelligent and earnest advocates of reform; he has consulted with them while their deliberations were in progress, and his suggestions are known to have been valuable; he now declares that he will be governed in his appointments by these regulations, and urges upon Congress the propriety of enacting such laws as will make the system obligatory upon his successors. It has been the fashion with certain editors and others to sneer at President GRANT's professed desire for reform as insincere, and assumed for it no other purpose than to delude the people with specious promises. Those who have persisted in this style of comment are perhaps satisfied of its injustice.

A WEAK PRETENSE OF HONESTY.

Syracuse Journal.

The New-York Tribune is disgusted at the turn things have taken in the Senate. It egotistically complains that Mr. CONKLING's resolution directing a thorough investigation of Custom-house affairs, "is a deliberate attempt to steal Senator FENTON's thunder." Who knew before that any Senator had a patent for the exclusive right to use reform "thunder?" If the Tribune were as honest as it pretends to be, it would welcome Mr. CONKLING's proposed investigation, as one of the things it has been endeavoring for the last two years to have done, and the taking the initiative in the matter. But that is not the Tribune's way of treating public men who refuse to be its stool-pigeons.

UNPRINCIPLED TACTICS.

Trenton Daily State Gazette.

We deeply regret to see such able, patriotic and trustworthy journals as the Post and Tribune pursuing so disingenuous and unworthy a course as this. Their persistent attempts to belittle and misrepresent everything that the President undertakes, even fearlessly trying to pick flaws in his honest attempts to reform the civil service, and to carry out other measures which they have demanded, is an exceedingly unfit piece of business. Their efforts to convince the country that the thirty-five eminent and upright gentlemen, who voted against Senator TRUMBULL'S original retrenchment resolution, are narrow-minded, unprincipled, and, withal, stupidly servile creatures of Gen. GRANT, are of a piece with their thick and thin denunciation of the President. If these dishonest tactics are persisted in, the country will come to understand them to its detriment in the praise and no demerit in the censure of such journals as the Post and Tribune.

A SCHEME OF POLITICAL REGENERACY.

Albany Evening Journal.

Mr. TRUMBULL's resolution provided for the revival of the Joint Select Committee. Parliamentary rules and customs would have put the Committee in the hands of those who made the proposition. Either Mr. TRUMBULL, the mover, or Mr. PATTERSON, the head of the Committee of the last Congress, would have been made Chairman, and both would have been members. Mr. PATTERSON, as a principal supporter, would have been sure to take place, if, indeed, he had not competed for the Chairmanship. One or more Democrats would also have been appointed. This would have given the Committee to the adversaries of the Administration, and that was precisely the game in view. Had honest, unbiased investigation been the real object, no one would have objected to this. But the plain design was to create capital against the Administration for next year. Just when the report should be made, just how it should be framed, would all have been dictated by that purpose. We make no imputations against those Senators. We simply say that as politicians they would naturally be what other politicians are in the habit of doing—make political engines subserve a political purpose.

THE TRICK OF THE OPPOSITION.

The St. Paul Daily Press.

Of course TRUMBULL, SCHURZ and the other Anti-Administration Senator, TIPTON, at once seized upon this action of the Republican majority in voting down his amendment, as prompted by a desire to cover up corruption and dishonesty in the civil service, and the course of the debate, in which these Senators fiercely attacked the administration of the New-York Custom-house, and that alone, revealed the real purpose of TRUMBULL'S amendment—which object was to get himself appointed—as he must have seen if his amendment had prevailed—as the Chairman of a committee to investigate the affairs of that famous institution which has been the bone of so much political contention in New-York from time immemorial, and which is the main cause of the quarrel between CONKLING and FENTON in New-York and of the division of the Republican Party in New-York City. Now, the Republican Administration Senators had not, we suppose, and as the result proved, the slightest objection to an impartial investigation into the affairs of the New-York Custom-house.

THE FIRST PRACTICAL STEP.

Pittsburg Daily Commercial.

The Commercial certainly cannot be charged with servility or sycophancy toward the present Administration. We believe, however, in rendering to every man, whether public officer or private citizen, the credit which he deserves; and we give it as our opinion that in this step the President has shown himself to be the most practical amendment of the spirit of reform and economy in public administration which the country has known for a long series of years. Whatever efforts have been made under previous Administrations to correct the evils growing out of the practice of treating the public service as a clover meadow for the benefit of certain politicians, have been either occasional, temporary; were not voluntary and unconstrained, and did not, as in this instance, proceed from the internal impulse and energy of the Administration itself. There have been numerous flamblings at the Gordian knot before, but this is the first blow of the history of the Government that was ever tempted to have struck at it. It has been eleven thought.

THE GIST OF THE MATTER.

Bangor Mail and Courier.

The gist of the matter seems to be that certain Senators are fearful lest the present Administration should add to its popular achievements by the successful inauguration of reform in the civil service, and hence the impatient demand that this subject be placed in the hands of anti-administration leaders, in order that the credit of blessing reform may fall upon them and not on the President. The significance of this action will not be misunderstood by the people, who well know that civil service reform has been debated in Congress without result; that the President has called to its practical consideration a special commission composed of eminent men, who have identified themselves with the principle; that, under his direction, they have devoted themselves to the task of devising a practicable method of reform, and that he has promised to lay the report of this commission before Congress at an early day, with the absence of his usual reticence, carrying out such recommendations as may be approved by the Executive judgment. This report is understood to be almost finally completed, and the unusual course of Senators in seeking to forestall a direct presentation of the President's Message is especially noticeable at a time when the promised document may be daily expected by Congress with such interest and anxiety as the country have to offer on the subject.

SENATOR EDMUNDS AND HIS CRITICS.

Burlington Free Press and Times.

If narrowness is indicated by having, in advance of many of his party colleagues, recognized the urgency of this great question of the time, then is Senator EDMUNDS convicted of holding contracted views. If this be narrowness it is a city that certain Senators, high in the esteem of the Tribune, could not be induced to narrow down a little for the future. No body ever accused Senator FENTON of having a "mind as keen as a razor's edge," but nobody denies that it is broad enough to appreciate the loyalty and intent of civil service legislation to all purveyors and sellers of public offices. The minds that are as broad as a dirty joke and as corrupt, are not those in whose amplitude the nation reposes, no matter how well such may stand with the Tribune; and so long as Senator EDMUNDS' narrowness has no more flagrant illustration than having early put himself among the pioneers of this latest reform, the country will credit him with being at least the equal in its breadth of mind of those who have openly opposed, or but coldly supported, what he so promptly helped to inaugurate, and has so consistently upheld.

A PLAN THAT HAD FAILED.

The Detroit Post.

Those papers and persons who have wondered why the Senate did not agree to the resolution will please note that it proposed a joint committee of four Senators and seven Representatives. This sort of a committee had already been in existence five years, and had been utterly barren of practical results, except spending nearly half a million dollars. Another Senate had been cast at it; and it had been extravagantly and immorally used. The objection is unpretended. It had performed nothing, and promised nothing worth the money it cost. Besides, the House has already acted by appointing a committee of its own—not a joint committee. Now, if the Senate had adopted Senator TRUMBULL'S resolution for a joint committee, it would have gained no time for getting at all. Before the joint Committee could have been formed, the House would have to debate. The House, when the resolution came to it, would have refused to concur.

SPECULATIVE HEAT.

Toledo Commercial.

It seems that Senators SUMNER, TRUMBULL, SCHURZ and two or three other enemies of the President, are not satisfied with the failure of their nice little attempt to jump on the top of the Retrenchment coach, seize the reins and drive the vehicle in the special interest of their Presidential schemes. They want "Reform," to be sure, but it must be a kind that brings cash to their bankers. It is not so much reform in the service that they seek, as some movement that will so far place the Administration in a false position as to overcome the popularity of Gen. GRANT.

OTHELLO'S OCCUPATION'S GONE.

Elmira Daily Advertiser.

We beg the people to observe that while Gen. GRANT is charged by his enemies with an unscrupulous use of what is called the public patronage to further his own ambitious purposes, he thus proposes at the very moment when the people are entering upon the choice of a successor to lay down all this power, as it is popularly called, and leave not only the people but the much-abused office-holders absolutely free from the influence of all official pressure. When neither the President nor members of Congress can any longer distribute the offices with reference to individual favor, and when public officers, without fear of politics, shall hold their positions practically during good behavior or until they die or resign, we don't see but the occupation of Messrs. SCHURZ, SUMNER & Co., will be pretty much gone.

A FAIR COMMITTEE.

Buffalo Commercial.

Of course, those who tried to make a stab at the President, and failed, are not satisfied at the course that affairs have taken. They must find fault, and so they maintain that the Investigating Committee is not made up of the right kind of men. There are some changes that might be advantageously made, we admit; but, upon the whole, the Committee is a fair one. None of the President's friends, whose loyalty to him got the better of their judgment, are in it; nor are any of those represented who sought to prejudice public opinion against the Administration. Senator BUCKINGHAM is the Chairman. There is, indeed, no charge to be impeached; his honesty and patriotism are beyond all question. He will lead the Committee on a man who is bound to find out what is lied and to show it up. He is, in all probability, one of GRANT's friends. But he would not shield his own kith and kin from censure, if he felt that they deserved it. He is not a politician, but a pure man in the Senate, and if those who are anxious for investigation object to Senator BUCKINGHAM, no further evidence is wanted of the utter insincerity of their motives.

KEEPING ABREAST OF PUBLIC OPINION.

Utica Morning Herald.

Thus far the President has so promptly, fairly and squarely met all the reasonable demands of the opposition, that it is difficult to see what they will discover to continue to find fault about. He set out with the assurance that he had no policy to enforce against the will of the people, and his every act since then has shown the sincerity of that assertion. So far as we know, he has not failed or hesitated to comply with what was clearly the popular will. This is one of the great secrets of his popularity. The people see that he means to do their work as they want it done; and, recognizing the efficiency of his administration, and especially its splendid financial achievements, they discover no good reason why they should dispense with the services of so faithful a person. Hence acts fairly charged in spirit of long-pended violence. He shows himself to be the right man in the right place, and they propose, as we understand it, to keep him there another term.

AN ANSWER TO ALL OPPONENTS.

Poughkeepsie Daily Eagle.

If the enemies of the Administration, including the New-York Tribune, will not be satisfied with all this, they give evidence that their opposition is dishonest and merely factious, that the charges they would make are false, and they know they cannot be maintained. That there are wrongs in the civil service and occasional abuses all admit, for under such a great and extensive Government as ours it is impossible it should be otherwise; but never since the Government was established have the houses been found in the State executions and fewer dishonest men found in office than under the administration of President GRANT.

Memorial Window to Franklin.

At a meeting in Philadelphia, on Thursday, of the Society of the Alumni of the University of Pennsylvania, Prof. CHARLES J. BUSH submitted a design for a stained glass window, to be placed in the chapel of the new building, to the memory of Dr. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN, the founder of the College of Philadelphia, from which the University originated. The window is of Gothic form, 35 feet high by 11 feet wide, having in the arch three compartments. In the upper one it is proposed to place a copy of the Duplessis portrait by MARTIN. As it is designed also to show the changes which have taken place since the first charter was granted to the Penn family by whom it was granted, will be placed in one of the lateral compartments, and the arms of the State of Pennsylvania, which adorned the present charter in 1701, in the other. The lower portion of the window is divided by mullions into five panels. On the centre one will be inscribed the famous line of THOMSON, "Eripuit coelo fulmen sceptrumque tyrannis," and underneath a civic crown. On the panels on one side of the centre will be placed pictures of the old Academy in Fourth-street, of the printing-press used by Dr. FRANKLIN in London, and a design suggested by his discoveries in electricity; on the other side a portrait of the inventor himself, the first improved printing-press, and of a magnetic telegraph machine. That portion of the window not occupied by the paintings will be of rich stained glass, in which appropriate emblems will be worked. The window has been designed, and will be executed in Philadelphia.

Business at the West.

The weather moderated considerably since our last, and on Friday and Saturday the temperature was above the freezing point, and on Sunday there was some rain; but Monday morning it turned cool, with a north wind.

Business continues to be restricted consequent upon the low stage of water in the river, and no material change from this position for the week, and a rise in the river is now looked for with much anxiety.

The flour and grain trade has not presented any feature of importance; the demand has been only fair and local. Corn and wheat are lower than they were a week ago. Cotton has become quite dull, and prices have declined. Whisky declined to 90 cents, but there has been a more active demand at the decline. There has been an active demand for hogs, and full rates have been realized, though the receipts continue quite large, but a hope is entertained that they will soon begin to fall off. Provisions, with the exception of lard, are unchanged. Lard is quite dull, indeed unprecedented. Heavy shipments of cut-meats and lard to Europe, constitute the basis for the continued good demand. The large shipments, however, in the most economical, should last nearly all winter, and the receipts during the next three months at the rate obtained since the 1st of November, it will need a large crop to supply the drain. The shipments from New-York from Nov. 1 to Dec. 12, just about six weeks, of pork, bacon and lard fell but little short of 30,000,000 pounds, compared with which the shipments for the two previous seasons for the corresponding time sink into comparative insignificance.

Prices of hogs and produce being higher at this place than other Western markets, there has been but little done in the latter at this point. Receipts of hogs have been heavy at Chicago and Milwaukee. The shipments of cut-meats from the former place during the past week reach 11,000,000 pounds.—Cincinnati Price Current, Dec. 20.

An increase of about 500,000 bushels over the receipts of 1870. This is independent of the amount received by the mills and W. B. ALLEN.

ENGLAND'S PRINCE.

The Crisis of His Illness.—Public Agitation.—Progress of the Disease.—Origin of the Fever.—The Health of the Queen.—Prince and People.

From Our Own Correspondent.

LONDON, Saturday, Dec. 9, 1871.

I am writing in almost momentary expectation of a telegram from Sandringham announcing the death of the Prince of WALES. At 1 o'clock this morning he appeared to be sinking fast; he has since slept, his breathing seems to be easier, and his exhaustion is not worse than it was. This is the news up to the time I post this letter, but of course, long before it reaches you, you will know the result of the struggle now going on in the hushed chamber down at Sandringham.

PUBLIC AGITATION.

The painful suspense and apprehension of the day are written in almost every face. There is a constant and anxious crowd round the newspaper offices, and at the stations where it has been usual during the last week or to two placard the latest medical bulletins. Business, of course, has not been suspended. Men have gone about their affairs as usual, but it is easy to see what thought is uppermost in their minds, and whenever two men meet, their first words are about the Prince, an eager inquiry for news, or an exclamation of hope or fear. All dinners and balls for to-night or next week have been put off, and it is doubtful whether the theatres will go on with their performances this evening. The apparently favorable progress of the case during the week has materially added to the shock which yesterday's news would in any case have conveyed to the public mind. There was a general opinion that the Prince was recovering, and that the most critical period of the malady had passed. Now there is a revulsion of feeling, and every body fears the worst. The particulars of Lord CHESTERFIELD's death, which have just been published, encourage the gloomy apprehensions which prevail. The EARL, after the first severity of the attack, also seemed to be rallying, when suddenly bad symptoms set in and he quickly sank. It is the essential character of enteric fever to corrode and eat away the intestines, and it was a fatal perforation of this kind which decided Lord CHESTERFIELD's fate, and has, it is supposed, occurred in the Prince's case.

THE PROGRESS OF THE SICKNESS.

It was on Nov. 23 that the Prince first began to feel unwell. This was more than a week after he had been at Scarborough, and he was then at Sandringham. For a few days he appeared to be only a little out of sorts, and it was thought that he had caught cold when out shooting, and would soon be better. He went up to town, attended the French play, and visited his friend Lord CARDIGROVE, at his place in the country. On Monday, the 28th, he was to have gone to a great shooting party, which had been arranged in his honor at the Maharajah DULEEP SING's seat in Norfolk, but the doctors persuaded him not to go at least for a day or two. From that time he began to get gradually worse. On Monday night he was very feverish, and next day it was clear that he was suffering from typhoid or enteric fever. On the 2d, Dr. GULL and Sir W. JENNER, two most eminent physicians, took charge of the case, and have ever since remained in constant attendance. At first the course of the fever, though sharp, was regular, and on the whole favorable. On the 26th and 27th he was delirious at night, and an exacerbation of the symptoms was also reported on the 28th. This was a very anxious time, and at the moment hope was almost abandoned; but the Prince bore up well; his strength was good, and on the 29th a change for the better took place. He was able to take some nourishment, slept soundly, and had a succession of quiet nights. On the 1st of December the Queen visited him and found him doing well, and down to yesterday the medical reports were unceasingly favorable. Good strength, quiet nights and a gradual lessening of the intensity of the fever—this was the uniform statement of the bulletins. On Thursday the symptoms were stated to be still regularly declining, but at night there was a sudden and alarming change. There was a considerable increase of fever, and delirium again occurred. The Prince slept at intervals yesterday, but there was a great prostration of strength, and for the first time the doctors decided his condition as precarious.

THE ORIGIN OF THE FEVER.

The difficulty of getting at the truth about anything has been curiously illustrated by the Prince's illness. It was confidently asserted that Lord CHESTERFIELD had never stayed at Londesborough Lodge, Scarborough, at all, whereas he not only was there during the Prince's visit, but afterward occupied the Prince's room. Another report was that a groom of the Duke of BEAUFORT, who had been with his master at Lord LONDESBOROUGH's, was also down with the fever. The Duke wrote to the papers to say that he had no groom with him at Scarborough, and that no groom of his was ill with fever. It is now known that the sick man is not a groom, but a temporary servant of the Duke's, who attended him at Scarborough. Again, when the first suggestion was made that the bad drainage of Londesborough Lodge must have had something to do with the diarrhœa, from which all the guests suffered more or less, as well as with the fever which afterward struck down the Prince and Lord CHESTERFIELD, Lord LONDESBOROUGH published a series of reports signed by competent persons, declaring that the drainage of his house was perfect in all respects. But some medical newspapers sent down special Commissioners to report on the subject, and it now appears that the drainage of the Lodge is as bad as anything could be. In fact the whole construction of the house affords in perfection all the conditions required to develop and propagate the enteric poison. It is built over two large cess-pools, between which and the inhabited parts of the building there were no fewer than thirteen communications. One of these cesspools has not been opened for at least six years. It receives the drainage of six closets situated immediately underneath the cabinet of the bedroom occupied first by the Prince of WALES, and afterward by Lord CHESTERFIELD, and is connected with this cabinet by a pipe only ten feet long. The sewage from the cess-pools is supposed to flow through the town drains into the sea, but the action of the tide often drives it back. The consequence is that the drains are a great reservoir of sewer-gas, and that the strong current of air passing through them blows this noxious gas into the houses, no traps being able to keep it out. Of course, Lord LONDESBOROUGH had no conception of the dangerous condition of his house, in which his own family had been residing for some time without any bad effects. The mysteries of enteric fever, why it breaks out in one place and not in another, why some people are passed over unscathed while others are stricken down, have yet to be solved. But there can hardly be a question that if anybody was predisposed to catch the fever, Londesborough Lodge was just the place to find it in perfection. Moreover the town of Scarborough, which is a fashionable watering-place, is itself far from wholesome. The new part is tolerably well drained, but the old part is not drained at all; it is a mass of middens, ash-holes and foul smells. The ground over which the royal party were shooting for several days is described as "a low, black, swampy land, five miles of drains." They used to pass on their way a disgusting public midden that sometimes infests the air for half a mile round. It must be further observed that just at this time Scarborough was crammed full of people, in consequence of the Prince's visit and the illuminations and other sights which attended it. Lord LONDESBOROUGH's house itself was packed from top to bottom. All the good bedrooms were, of course, assigned to the guests and the servants were pigged together anyhow and anywhere. Three maid-servants slept in a room six feet ten inches in height, the Prince's valet in a room six feet four inches in height and another servant in a kind of housemaid's cupboard. That nothing should be left undone to breed sickness, men were employed to keep the drains constantly flushed, which would have been all very well and their communicated directly with the sea but which, as it was, had the effect of stirring up the fetid accumulations of the cess-pools and filling the house with poisonous exhalations. Everybody is very sorry for Lord LONDESBOROUGH, whose ignorance about these matters is not greater than that of most educated Englishmen. It is not surprising that these disclosures and the painful consequences of sanitary neglect in this instance should have created something like a panic. The newspapers are full of drains, stink traps and typhoid fever, and the result will perhaps be that the sewerage of houses will be conducted henceforth in a more scientific and careful manner, and perhaps have the benefit of official inspection, with a bill of fares and penalties for neglected or insufficient drainage.

THE QUEEN'S HEALTH.

The embarrassments and even danger of a Regency, which I indicated in a former letter, have been brought closer to the public mind by the melancholy apprehensions of yesterday and today. The Queen has borne up wonderfully under this great trial, but I need hardly say that, with her peculiar mental and bodily constitution, the effects of a reaction are greatly feared. We are now close upon a dark anniversary. It was on the 8th December, 1861, that the Prince Consort was taken ill; on the 10th it was known that his malady was fever; and near midnight on Saturday, the 14th, he died. Ten years of mourning and seclusion have rather confirmed than alleviated the bitter sorrow of the widowed Queen; and the death of her son, in the prime of life, almost on the anniversary of his father's death, would be a blow the consequences of which would naturally be serious, and might be even fatal. In any case, it is scarcely probable that she would take hereafter much part in public affairs. The Home Secretary is now at Sandringham, to take the Queen's orders in the event of the Prince's death.

THE PRINCE OF WALES AND THE PEOPLE.

A cynic might remark that there is nothing particularly noble or heroic in catching typhoid fever, or even dying of it; but the new tenderness and regard for the Prince of WALES which have sprung up since he has been on a sick-bed, and especially within these last two days, represent a very natural feeling, of which there is no reason to be ashamed. There are two sides to the Prince's character, and it is only fair that they should both be taken into account. But, till the other day, there was, perhaps, too much disposition in certain quarters to look at only one side. It was noted that he enjoyed himself in rather a boyish way, and did not show much taste or aptitude for serious business. But, on the other hand, it was not sufficiently considered how a person in his position is placed at a disadvantage in this respect, both as regards the temptations by which he is surrounded and the narrow limits within which his activity is circumscribed. He was shut out from politics, and could only have done mischief by meddling with them. He might have won popularity with the army, by taking a personal interest in military affairs, but it would have been at the expense of his popularity with the country, which would have been especially jealous of such relations between the future King and the army. Of course he might have taken more interest in art, science, letters. It would have pleased the people if he had done so; but I am not so sure, recollecting what game of his father's meddling with these things, that the result would have been altogether wholesome for art and science. On the whole there is not much left for a Prince to do nowadays, except amuse himself decently and decorously, and be very pleasant and affable with the people with whom he is thrown into contact. And tried by this standard the Prince comes out very well. I have said before that the vile scandals which were circulated about him were the coinage of lying malice or prurient folly. He had come to man's estate but he had never had the advantages of a man's discipline or responsibilities. He was really a big boy in many respects, in his frank good nature, heartiness, warm affections, candid simplicity, and dislike of ceremony and parade. He liked a free and easy life, and that was all—there was nothing bad about it. All who had any opportunities of knowing him personally can tell of his thorough goodness of heart, his spontaneous and unostentatious kindness, his simple gratitude for small attentions naturally paid to one in his position. He had in a remarkable degree, the family faculty of recollecting faces, and when he had once made an acquaintance made a point of showing that there should be no failure of recognition on his part. Another hereditary peculiarity was his quick intelligence and retentive memory for everything he was told. He had no particular liking for books, any more than his great grand father, and never seemed to make much of them. What he read did not rest in his mind as anything that was told him in speech did. Although never, in any sense, a student, and with no scholarship, he was well-informed on a great variety of subjects, and took an intelligent interest in them. His visits to the United States, with the Duke of NEWCASTLE, made a deep impression on him, and he often resorted to it in conversation. The self-discipline of the Americans, their prompt, practical turn of mind, and the tendency of the people to reduce governing machinery to a minimum, as in keeping order for themselves on the occasion of a great procession or demonstration, especially secured his admiration. I find that in writing this I have insensibly slipped into the past tense. I can only pray that it may not be so, and that long before this letter reaches you it become the proper term in which to speak of a good-hearted, manly (for he was manly in a boy's sense) young fellow, whose faults came of his position, while his good qualities were his own.

Statement of the City and County Debt.

The following official statement of the City and County debt is promulgated by the Controller:

CITY OF NEW-YORK, DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE, CONTROLLER'S OFFICE, Dec. 21, 1871.

At the close of business on the 19th of December, 1871, the "interest-bearing funded debt" of the City and County of New-York was as follows:

Stocks and Bonds bearing interest at five, six and seven per cents per annum redeemable from the Sinking Fund.....$27,620,216 49
Stocks and Bonds of the City and County of New-York bearing six, seven and seven-three per cent. per annum:
City.....$94,073,000 00.
County.....20,070,000 00—$4,161,082 01
Total.....$97,371,000 01
Less assets in Sinking Fund consisting of Stocks and Cash on hand on Dec. 19, 1871.....20,197,082 52
Net funded debt.....$97,294,715 49

TEMPORARY AND FLOATING DEBT.

Seven per cent. Assessment Bonds.....$14,360,700 00
Revenue Bonds at six and seven per cent. per annum:
City.....$5,475,100 00
County.....800,000 00—6,275,100 00
Interest on same.....243,516 30
Due the State on Tax of 1871.....4,397,601 88
Unpaid warrants on the Treasury:
City.....$265,997 59
County.....1,105,679 31—1,381,676 87
Balance Park Fund, Croton Aqueduct and Ninth District Court-house Fund.....907,176 23—28,566,071 25
Total.....$95,493,786 54
The cash in City and County Treasury on the 16th December, 1871, was.....$6,000,919 12
Total.....$84,139,567 32

In addition to the above debt, claims have been presented on unsettled accounts, amounting to about.....6,000,000 00

Total ascertained debt and claims presented, after deducting the sinking fund and cash in bank.....$84,539,567 32

It is known that a large amount of claims will yet come in, for services rendered and materials furnished the several Departments of City and County Government during the year 1871, which cannot, for want of definite information, cannot now be accurately stated. Claims to a considerable amount for previous years are also likely to be presented.

The assessment bonds, and much of the temporary and floating debt, are redeemable from collection of assessments, taxes and arrears of taxes, but the amount that will be realized from these sources is liable to diminution to the extent that assessments are uncollectable. There are also bonds and mortgages, taken in sales of real estate amounting to $1,123,000 24, the proceeds of which, when collected, are applicable to the payment of stocks and bonds redeemable by the sinking fund.

The carrying on of work, such as court house, water-works, docks and piers, Park, New-York Bridge to Brooklyn, bridges or tunnels across Harlem River, and the improvement of Harlem River, under authority of various acts of the Legislature, some of which are in progress, will add, in a greater or less extent, to the funded debt of the City, according to the amount of expenditure that is required to be made upon them.

ANDREW H. GREEN, Controller.

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

A Summary of President Thiers' Message—Its Reception and Impression.

From the London Times.

The sitting of the National Assembly on Dec. 7 began at 2 o'clock. M. GRÉVY returned thanks for being re-elected President, saying that he accepted this fresh mark of confidence on the part of the Assembly with the more pleasure as it did not impose any sacrifice on his convictions.

M. THIERS then proceeded to read his Presidential message. It points to the daily progress made in the re-establishment of peace without and reorganization within. In order to appreciate this progress, M. THIERS says it must never be forgotten to what condition the Empire had brought France.

RESULTS OF THE WAR.

"After an insurrection without parallel in history, we are able to say that the amount of good exceeds the amount of evil. Our relations with Europe have become peaceful and cordial. Our position as France is exactly defined. The taxes are being paid regularly. Our army was our first consolation in our misfortunes. Order is completely re-established. The National Guards have been disarmed without resistance. For a complete reorganization of France we must look to time and reflection; and to all endowed with the instincts of modern society. The situation is as favorable as it could be after such a disastrous war. The policy of France henceforth is a policy of universal sympathies and confidence. Her country is all probability, events absolute disarm their power, the deed will not be that of France. France must become once more what she has a right to be in the interest of all States. France will come to her solemnly pledged word. Moreover, the States which took part in the War are fatigued; the witnesses had become seriously alarmed."

INTERNATIONAL RELATIONS.

The Message then enters into details of the relations between France and the other Powers of Europe:

"Our relations with Spain continue amicable. We likewise maintain a good understanding with Italy. The independence of the Holy See must be rigorously upheld. As regards Rome the official communications have given no advice to any one, and least of all to an old and good man who enjoys all our respect and sympathy. Our regard to Austria, we sincerely wish her prosperity. As regards Russia, the most cordial relations exist between that country and France. They are the result of an elevated and reciprocal appreciation of the interests of both countries. There is, therefore, nothing to prevent the amicable Commerce and labor may resume their activity with entire confidence."

The message makes an allusion either to the constitutional question, to the return of the Assembly to Paris or to the Orleans Princes taking their seats in the Assembly.

COMMERCIAL TREATIES.

The President of the Republic enlarges on the subject of commercial treaties, especially that with England. He quotes that the French Government has received to give notice of its determination to withdraw from it, but will nevertheless, continue their negotiations on the question during next year, in compliance with the conditions of the treaty. The message announces the conclusion of a convention with Germany for a customs treaty with Alsace-Lorraine.

THE INVASION.

The message reverts to the situation of the interior. It acknowledges the difficulty of establishing a good administration. "We may say loudly that we receive from all sides marks of sympathy." The message was frequently cheered with noisy interruptions by the Right. M. THIERS added that the present sessions of the Councils-General was a proof of public spirit, conciliation, and prudence.

"While awaiting the definite liberation of the country, we have applied ourselves to separate the population from the German soldiers, who have been quartered on it. We have asked the people to restrain their resentment, which would not abridge their suffering, but might compromise the safety of France. The life of a foreigner is as sacred as the life of a countryman."

FINANCIAL.

Referring to the financial position of the country, the message adverts to the fact that the Budget of 1872 amounts to 2,800,000,000 francs. Nothing was paid of, and the army was neglected. "We had 200,000 men to oppose 700,000 of the enemy. We thus arrived at an increase of debt to the amount of eight milliards, of which we paid the interest. We have, besides, to strengthen our frontiers. The expenditure will be reduced by 250,000 francs." Receipts, 2,400,000,000 francs. The ordinary Budgets will reach a total of 2,749,000,000 francs, including the Provincial expenditure. In twenty years we have had an increase of 1,250,000,000 francs of expenditures. This we owe to the Empire." The message announces that the army will henceforth consist of 150 regiments of infantry, counting 3,000 sapeurs to each regiment, and 600 men for every division. The floating debt will be reduced to 600,000,000 francs. The redemption will be effected regularly. The message further says that the National Assembly will choose between duties on raw material and other duties which will be submitted to it. The message gives particulars with regard to exchange operations and the purchase of foreign bills. It alludes to the monetary crisis, and states that the Bank of France will be authorized to increase the circulation by 400,000,000 francs, 500,000,000 francs, or 600,000,000 francs, and to issue small notes. The message concludes by saying that the financial situation is as satisfactory as can be desired under the circumstances.

ARMY ORGANIZATION.

Reverting to army organization and to the necessary time required for it, and to the compulsory service, M. THIERS said that every Frenchman owes his blood to the country when it is in danger, but he does not admit that in time of peace every Frenchman should be drafted into the army, thereby disorganizing and destroying civil life and ruining the finances. Numerous protests were raised against this part of the Message.) M. THIERS continued:

"If such a course should be followed, France would be lost. We propose compulsory service in time of war, and an annual contingent of 80,000 men in time of peace. The young men will draw lots; the lowest numbers will enter upon active service. We shall thus have 800,000 men, of whom 450,000 will remain five years with the colors. The others will remain at home to guard the cities."

RESPONSIBILITY OF THE GOVERNMENT.

In conclusion, M. THIERS said:

"In closing this long exposé, it remains for me to touch upon a grave, delicate and exciting (brûlant) subject. After having spoken of our domestic and foreign affairs, of our administration, our finances and army, it may seem strange that I have not yet spoken of questions of politics, of the best form of government, of the momentous politics of the moment which occupy all minds. And nevertheless it is the fact that the situation is so extraordinary that all those objects—diplomacy, finance, military organization—do not seem to be politics, in presence of so many Governments destroyed in the past fifty years, and of so many pretext disputes which have been the cause of their fall. Government. But here, gentlemen, begins your task; for you are the sovereign, and we are but administrators delegated to effect the work of what I have called the reorganization of the country. Well that present policy, having for its object the constitution of a definitive Government, ensures the country all it wants, we would encroach upon your rights if we took a precipitate initiative on that subject. As for myself, overwhelmed with fatigue, and sometimes with sorrow when I turn aside for a moment from the consideration of the sole object of my solicitude, the accomplishment of the task which the country has confided to me, I am only endeavoring to forego relations, its domestic administration, its finances, its army, maintaining a rigorous order while that task was being accomplished, and holding myself always ready to restore to you unimpaired, in its every part, the power you have placed in my hands. Here is it, I say, just as you gave it to me, reorganized partially, but, above all, conformably to the contract framed between us. I restore it to you. What will you do with it? You are the Sovereign. I am not so, but a simply delegated administrator. I am, therefore, only the depositary of a right. It is but a vain word, for you are the chosen, the freely chosen, of the country. To make to you to-day proposals on all that is of a constituent character (constituant) would be, on the part of my colleagues and myself, an act of hostility against the sovereign power, an assault upon your rights. But we are also elected of the country, and we have duties to fulfill as members of this Assembly and as members of the Government. When, shirking up yourselves the grave questions which preoccupy men's minds, you shall compel us to declare our opinions with regard to the country, we will answer you with frankness and good faith. Until that time, however, my colleagues and myself have only one faithful and exact account to render of our doings, and we have rendered it. There remains a word to be said to you to-day. It may be spent the finishing touch to our sincerity. The country as a whole, saving some insignificant exceptions—the country is wise. It feels the misfortunes; it wishes to retrieve them; and if party spirit sometimes displays itself, it is soon put down by moderate opinion, which ever carries the necessity of sacrificing all party passions to the evident and proved public advantage. The country—I repeat it with profound conviction—is wise; the parties alone would be otherwise. It is from them, and from them alone, that there is anything to fear; it is from them alone that it is needful for you to protect yourselves, not against them (for you must save yourselves with calmness, and courage, and energy. It is against the parties, against their passions even when these arise from the best intentions, that you must prepare yourselves for resistance; and—in a situation in which a long series of revolutions has left the soil strewn with so many parties and sub-divisions of parties—you must raise yourselves above them, to a supreme height of justice, of moderation, and firmness. Already you have often done so; and in the most disturbed days, when it seemed as if storms must be the issue of your deliberations, from within there have sprung from them resolves of lofty and profound wisdom. It is to the majority which is the author

THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

Of these salutary resolves that I appeal myself now, and, all regretful as I am, if in this same path of wisdom my devotion is still useful to you for a short time longer (encore quelque temps) you may depend upon it. But if it is not indispensable to you, if you would rather call to my degree to approve the views I hold, still the country will make just as single step, and deposing once more a mere workman, faithful and submissive, I will restore to you the work which you have intrusted to me—to the upright and wise assistance of your colleagues, in a better condition than I received it. And I express myself in such terms only because all of you can do as much, and even more, when the day comes for you to appear again before the constituencies. On that day the country will owe to you and will bestow on you its thanks—if it is just, and it will be just—for the immense services which you have rendered, more than the whole, in all probability, that are yet to render."

Effect of the Message.

The physiognomy of the Chamber while the message was being read was a very interesting study. It is safe to predict that the session just opened will be a stormy one. In the beginning of the message, subsequent reference made to the necessity of comparing the state of the country as it was left by the Empire with that in which it now is were very well received. The Assembly unanimously applauded the passage which spoke of the "respected" and "respectable." The Left applauded the passage referring to Italy. The Right ignored that which spoke of the Holy See. The Assembly received very favorably the anxious desire expressed for the reorganization of Austria, and applauded what was

ALABAMA POLITICS.

Review of the Recent Campaign—Why the Republicans Lost the State—Interesting Inside View of the Situation.

From Our Own Correspondent.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., Wednesday, Dec. 13, 1871.

During the last six months the public attention as the North has so often been drawn to the politics of Alabama, that a short history of the recent career of the Republican Party in this State, with a statement of its present condition and future prospects, may not be without interest. Probably no party ever started out upon a campaign more confident of a triumphant indorsement by the people than did the Republicans of Alabama last Fall. The course of the party up to the time of holding the Convention for the nomination of a State ticket had in the main been wise and judicious. It had avoided the extreme measures and policy that many Southern States had stranded the bitter partisans of the old elements of the body politic. Gov. SMITH'S administration had held the Republicans practically united, while it did much toward conciliating the whole of the white people. It was, of course, not without clamorers. Its railroad policy, though founded upon correct principles, and calculated to do much for the prosperity of the State, if carried out with prudence, had been pushed beyond the limits of wise and careful statesmanship; yet even this had not distracted more who had sought to destroy or injure it committed by workers within the Republican ranks. There had been the usual jealousies that have cropped out in the new era of politics in the South between the native Republicans and those from the North, but the exercise of patience and forbearance by most of the leaders of both classes had prevented any dissensions. Judge SAMUEL F. RICE, Ex-Gov. LEWIS E. PARSONS, Col. ALEX. WHITE, three of the most eminent lawyers in Alabama, the first an original Secessionist, the last two old Union men, were chief among those who announced their adhesion to the Republican Party, prepared to work for its triumph in November. Nor were Gov. SMITH, Maury, especially in North Alabama, who had done hard service in the Confederate armies, and some of whom held high rank therein, boldly took the same course. The State Journal, the leading Republican paper in the State, had been edited for some time with signal ability by an Ex-Confederate. Favorable indications were all the signs for a Republican victory. The State had been carried for GRANT in 1868, by a majority of 4,000, after a very imperfect canvass, no registration of the voters having been ordered until the middle of October. In 1869, at the Congressional election in August, the State again indorsed Republican principles by largely increased majorities. In neither of these contests had the Republicans fought under such auspicious omens as those which heralded the campaign of 1870.

Bright as was the prospect, however, there were more than two agencies at work against the Republicans. One of these agencies was the dreaded Kuklux Klan. This organization, which in previous campaigns had only appeared in a few counties in North Alabama, commenced operations as soon as the nominations of both parties were completed in almost every county of the Third and Fourth Congressional Districts, and in many portions of the Fifth and Sixth. That it succeeded by the terror it inspired, in keeping at least ten thousand Republican voters from the polls, there is no doubt, and there is just as little doubt that at least a quarter of that number were compelled by force or fraud, to vote the Democratic ticket. The Democratic leaders apparently felt, that now or never was their time. If the Republicans succeeded in this election their control of the State would in all probability become a permanency. The old Whig and Douglas Union elements were becoming restive under the sway which the Democratic fire-eaters contemptuously held over them. All that they needed to induce them to break with the Democrats, once and forever, was the assurance that the Republicans were able and willing to give the people good Government. The leaders of the Democracy realized all this, and the machinery of the Kuklux Klan was worked with a relentless ferocity during the whole campaign to accomplish a Republican defeat. Republican meetings were broken up; assassination was of frequent, and flogging of daily and nightly occurrence, and as it was by such means that the Democracy attempted to stem the rising tide of Republicanism.

The other agency against Republicanism existed within the party itself, and formed in a little knot of disaffected men, at the head of whom was United States Senator GEORGE E. SPENCER. How this gentleman came to be elected to the position he holds is one of the mysteries of politics. Elected he was, however, and his Senatorial career had scarcely commenced before he became engaged in a bitter quarrel with his colleague, Mr. WARNER. SPENCER also became involved in a violent personal feud with Gov. SMITH, and he made a desperate effort to prevent his renomination. His followers were at work in all the southern portions of the State to accomplish this purpose, even visiting and operating in counties where they did not reside. Most of the heavy colored counties were worked upon in this way, the argument being that Gen. SPENCER was the special friend of the colored people, as he had taken extreme ground against the removal of disabilities, while Gov. SMITH was no friend at all, as he had failed to call out the militia to protect them from the KUKLUX. Notwithstanding all this Senator SPENCER failed to prevent the renomination of Gov. SMITH, yet there was a strong under-current of feeling against trying Gov. SMITH for another term, and this feeling was especially strong with the colored people, who distrusted him because of the want of vigor that characterized his treatment of the disorders that had afflicted the State, and it only needed some leader possessing the confidence of the men who held these views to concentrate a majority of the Convention upon almost any good man in opposition to Gov. SMITH. It is well known now that Auditor R. M. REYNOLDS could have obtained the nomination for Governor had he chosen to seek it. But he and other Republican leaders thought it wisest and best that no pretext even should be given for lukewarmness in the canvass to the old Union men, whose representative Gov. SMITH was, and that the latter actually was the strongest candidate is proven by the fact that he ran ahead of all his colleagues on the ticket in every Congressional district and in almost every county in the State. He was renominated by acclamation. The general result of the election is well known. The majority against Gov. SMITH was 1,441, and about double that against the remainder of the ticket. This was the size of the vote as declared, but it does not tell the whole story. Through the fault of the Democratic Sheriff and Clerk no return was made from Russell County, where it was well known that the Republican ticket had received nearly 1,600 majority, and there were transparent frauds in the returns from two or three other counties. But what it was proposed to institute a legal investigation of these matters, and ascertain what was the real choice of the people, Senator SPENCER and his friends in the Democratic hovel against the step. SMITH had been beaten, they said, and he must give up to his opponent. The point was made by a large majority of the Republicans, that he had not been beaten, and that a legal inquiry was only necessary to establish the fact that his opponent had not been chosen. But this was earnestly ignored by these new allies of the Democracy.

We now come to the Senatorial contest. It was very gratifying to the Spencer wing that SMITH was defeated. It was absolutely essential to their future political existence of this object of their fanatical hate. Gov. SMITH should be defeated for the Senatorial succession. While the two served together in the Senate, SPENCER had been completely overshadowed by the more commanding position which superior abilities and greater personal influence had secured to SMITH. SPENCER had two years longer to serve, but in the event of SMITH'S election he would continue to be a politician by sharing in that time. All his energies and every resource that he could command were accordingly brought to bear for WARNER'S defeat. His followers made no secret of their intentions in this matter. They openly declared that they would submit to no caucus nomination, and that they were undertable to the Senate to WARNER in any of his friends. To illustrate how desperately he determined they were to accomplish their end a statement of the composition of the Legislature is necessary. The entire Senate, consisting of thirty-two Republicans and one Democrat, held over, and they had a majority of five in joint ballot, notwithstanding the fact that the Democratic majority in the House operated several Republican members of that body so that present at another before the election for Senator occurred. A large majority of the Republican members of the Legislature, consisting of all the Representatives and about half the Senators, met in caucus, and unanimously nominated Gen. WARNER. On the first ballot in the Legislature, each House voting separately, there was no choice. The next day, in joint convention, the vote stood as follows: GOLDTHWAITE, 66; WARNER, 60; HARALSON, (Republican bolters' candidate,) 14; GOLDTHWAITE thus receiving barely one majority. Among those who voted for him were two members elected as Republicans. Two Republican Representatives, for reasons that have never transpired, absented themselves from the Capital. These who voted for HARALSON, two excepted, were all Senators elected nearly three years previous, and many of them disappointed office-seekers, and included all of the followers of SPENCER. Every counter-test as to the Legislature, and every Republican who was fresh from election by the people, with the exceptions named, voted for WARNER.

THE LATE CHARLES DICKENS.

Glimpses of His Early Life—Mr. John Forster's Biography of the Novelist.

From the Manchester Examiner & Times.

The first volume of Mr. JOHN FORSTER'S Life of Charles Dickens was published yesterday, and it will, we are sure, be regarded as a welcome and fitting epilogue to the labors of a life with which the biographer was most intimately acquainted. The volume confirms many surmises that had already passed muster as accepted facts, and contains much that is new and deeply interesting concerning the early life of DICKENS, especially in the autobiographical portion of the work. Nothing can be more touching than his own account of the hardships he was compelled to endure when his father fell into difficulties which led to his confinement in the Marshalsea Prison, so graphically described in Little Dorrit. At the age of ten years he entered the service of a blacking manufacturer, named LAMERT, a relative of the family, and he gives the following account of himself, and some account of other humble folk people to whom he became famous:

"It is wonderful to me how I could have been so easily cast away at such an age. It is wonderful to me that, even after my descent into the poor little drudge I had been since we came to London, no one had compassion enough on me—a child of singular sensitive, quick, eager, delicate self, poorly but bodily or mentally—to suggest that something might have been spared, as certainly it might have been, to place me at any common school. Our friends, I take it, were tired out. No one made any sign. My father and mother were quite satisfied. They could hardly have been more so if I had been a favorite county years. I, son, distinguished as a grammar-school, and going to Cambridge.

The blacking warehouse was the last house on the left-hand side of the way, at old Hungerford Stairs. It was a crazy, tumble-down old house, abutting, of course, on the river, and literally overrun with rats. Its wainscoted rooms, and its rotten floors and staircase, and the old grey rats swarming down in the cellars, and the sound of their squeaking and scuffling coming up the stairs at all times, and the dirt and decay of the place rise up visibly before me, as if I were there again. The counting-house was on the first floor, looking over the coal-barges and the river. The humble station and duties I was to occupy in it are fixed indelibly in my memory. My work was to cover the pots of paste-blacking, first with a piece of oil-paper, and then with a piece of blue paper; to tie them round with a string; and then to strip the paper close and neat all round, until it looked as smart as a pot of ointment from a apothecary's shop. When a certain number of grosses of pots had attained this pitch of perfection I was to paste on each a printed label, and then go on again with more pots. Two or three other boys were kept on a similar duty down-stairs on similar wages. One of them came up, in a ragged apron and a paper cap, on the first Monday morning, to show me the trick of the work, and to tie the first knot. His name was BOB FAGIN; and I took the liberty of using his name, long afterward, in Oliver Twist.

Our relative had kindly arranged to teach me something in the dinner hour—from 12 to 1, I think it was, every day. But an arrangement so incompatible with counting-house business could never have lasted long. I was shortly and for the same reason my small responsibilities, and my grosses of pots, my papers, string, scissors, paste-pot, and labels, by little and little vanished out of the recess in the counting-house, and kept company with the other small work-tables, grindstones of pots, papers, string, paste-pots, and scissors in the warehouse. It was not long before BOB FAGIN and I, and another boy, whose name was PAUL GREEN, but who was currently believed to have been christened POLL, (a belief which I transferred, long afterward again, to Mr. Sweedlepipe, in Martin Chuzzlewit,) worked generally side by side. Bob Fagin was an orphan, and lived with his grandfather-in-law, a waterman. POLL GREEN'S father had the additional distinction of being a fireman, and was employed at Drury-lane Theatre, where another relation of POLL'S, I thing his little sister, did imps in the pantomimes.

No words can express the secret agony of my soul as I sunk into this companionship; compared these every-day associates with those of my happier childhood; and felt my early hopes of growing up to be a learned and distinguished man crushed in my breast. The deep remembrance of the sense I had of being utterly neglected and hopeless; of the shame I felt in my position; of the misery it was to my young heart to believe that, day by day, what I had learned, and thought, and dreamed in, and raised my fancy and my emulation up by, was passing away from me, never to be brought back any more; cannot be written. My whole nature was so penetrated with the grief and humiliation of such considerations, that even now, famous and caressed and happy, I often forget in my dreams that I have a dear wife and children; even that I am a man, and wander desolately back to that time of my life."

In a fragment of autobiography which DICKENS wrote in 1847, he said:

"From that hour until this at which I write, no word of that part of my childhood, which I have now dimly brought to a close, has passed my lips to any human being. I have no idea how long it lasted—whether for the year, or much more, or less. From that time forward my father and my mother have been stricken dumb upon it. I have never heard the least allusion to it, however far off and remote, from either of them. I have never, until I now impart it to this paper, in any hint of confidence with any one, my own wife not excepted, raised the curtain I then dropped, thank God."

FAMILY TROUBLES.

Mr. JOHN DICKENS being unable to make any arrangement with his creditors, Mrs. DICKENS was obliged to break up her household in Gower-street North, and go into the Marshalsea. We give Mr. CHAS. DICKENS' own account of his circumstances at that time:

"The key of the house was sent back to the landlord, who was very glad to get it, and I (small loss that it was, except that they could never do the harm to anyone) was handed over as a lodger to a reduced old lady, long known to our family, in Little College-street, Camden Town, who took children in to board, and had once done so in Brighton, and who, with a few alterations and embellishments, unconsciously began to sit for Mrs. Pipchin when she took me in.

She had a little brother and sister under her care then; somebody's natural children, who were very irregularly paid for; and a widow's little son. The two boys and I slept in the same room. My own exclusive breakfast of a penny cottage loaf and a pennyworth of milk, I procured myself. For my dinner I kept another small loaf and a quarter of a pound of cheese, on a particular shelf of a particular cupboard, to make my supper on when I came back at night. They made a hole in the six or seven shillings. I know well; and I was but at the blacking warehouse all day, and had to support myself upon that money all the week. I suppose my lodging was paid for by my mother, or father, certainly did not pay it myself; and I certainly had no other assistance whatever, (the making of my clothes, I think, excepted,) from Monday morning until Saturday night. No advice, no counsel, no encouragement, no consolation, no support, from any one that I can call to mind, can be looked for.

Sundays. FANNY and I passed in the prison. I was at the Academy in Tenterden-street, Hanover-square, at 9 o'clock in the morning, to fetch her, and we walked back there together, at night.

I was so young and childish, and so little qualified—how could I be otherwise?—to undertake the whole charge of my own existence, that in going to Hungerford Stairs of a morning, I could not resist the stale pastry put out at half-price on trays at the confectioners' doors in Tottenham Court-road; and I often spent in that the money I should have kept for my dinner. Then I went without my dinner, or bought a roll or a slice of pudding. There were two pudding-shops between which I was divided according to my finances. One was in a court close to St. Martin's Church, at the back of the church, which is now removed altogether. The pudding at this shop was made with currants, and was rather a special pudding, but was dear—two pean'orth not being larger than a penn'orth of more ordinary pudding. A good shop for the latter was in the Strand, somewhere near where the Lowther Arcade is now. It was a stout, hale pudding, heavy and fat. Baby, with great raisins in it, stuck in whole, at great distances a part. It came up hot, at about noon every day, and many and many a day did I dine off it.

We had half an hour, I think, for tea. When I had money enough, I used to go to a coffee-shop, and have half a pint of coffee, and a slice of bread and butter. When I had no money, I took a turn in Covent Garden Market, and stared at the pine-apples. The coffee-shops to which I most resorted were, one in Maiden-lane; one in a court (non-existent now) close to Hungerford Market; and one in St. Martin's-lane, at which I only recollect that it stood near the church, and that in the door there was an oval glass plate with "Coffee-room" painted on it, addressed toward the street. If I ever find myself in a very different kind of coffee-room now, but where there is such an inscription on glass, and read it backward on the wrong side, 'moor eeffOC' (as I often used to do from the inside of a small reverie,) a shock goes through my blood.

I know I do not exaggerate, unconsciously and unintentionally, the keenness of my misery when I say that, to the present hour, the sight of any of the meanest kind of shops occupied by a cheesemonger, a greengrocer, or a bookstall keeper, is painful to me, because of the remembrance it awakens."

VISIT TO THE MARSHALSEA.

The following was written by Mr. DICKENS as a personal experience of his visit to the Marshalsea Prison:

"My father was waiting for me in the lodge, and I went up to his room, (on the top story but one,) and cried very much. And he told me, I remember, to take warning by the Marshalsea, and to observe that if a man had £20 a year, and spent £19 19s. 6d., he would be happy; but that a shilling spent the other way would make him wretched. I see the fire we sat before now, with two bricks inside the rusty grate, one on each side, to prevent its burning too many coals. Some other debtor shared the room with him, who came by and by; but as the dinner was a joint-stock repast, I was sent up to Capt. Porter in the room overhead, with Mr. DICKENS' compliments, and I was his son, and could Capt. Porter lend me a knife and fork.

Capt. PORTER lent me the knife and fork, with his compliments in return. There was a very dirty lady in his little room, and two wan girls, his daughters, with shock heads of hair. I thought I should not have liked to borrow Capt. PORTER'S comb. The Captain himself was in the last extremity of shabbiness, and, if I could form an idea of a man so occupied, and dealing with a thing so anomalous, could to treat me as one upon a different footing from the rest. I was not, as a boy, to mean so, but was that I came to be there, so gave the least indication of being sorry that I was there. That I suffered in secret, and that I suffered exquisitely, no one ever knew but I. How much I suffered, it is as I have said already, utterly beyond my power to tell. No man's imagination can bear upon the reality. But I kept my own counsel. And I did my work. I knew from the first, that if I could not do my work as well as any of the rest, I could not hold myself above slight and contempt. I soon became at least as expeditious and as skilful with my hands as either of the other boys. Though perfectly familiar with them, my conduct and manners were different enough from theirs to place a space between us. They and the men always spoke of me as "the young gentleman." A certain man (a soldier once) named THOMAS, who was the foreman, and another named HARRY, who was the carman and wore a red jacket, used to call me "CHARLES" sometimes in speaking to me; but I think it was mostly when we were very confidential, and when I had made some efforts to entertain them over our work with the results of some of the old readings, which were fast perishing out of my mind."

The Grand Jury have reported that Judge BEDFORD was "equitably entitled" to the payment of his claim of $5,850, on account of the extra services rendered as Assistant District-Attorney from 1864 to 1869. Our criticisms were directed less to the claim itself than to the mode of its presentation and payment. This latter objection the report of the Grand Jury fails to touch. We frankly accept, however, this exoneration of Judge BEDFORD, in so far as it refers to the validity of the grounds on which the claim was made. The public will be as glad as ourselves to be assured of the fact that a Judge who is unquestionably doing good service in the cause of Reform, appears on the side of justice with clean hands. There is nothing to be gained by corrupt compromises in any direction for the sake of obtaining an immediate public good. It is with much relief and satisfaction, therefore, that we accept Judge BEDFORD as a powerful ally in the cause of Reform, with his record free from an apparent stain, which would undoubtedly have been made the subject of unpleasant comment.

Controller GREEN'S first official statement of the amount of the City and County debt at the close of business, Dec. 16, 1871, has the merit of perfect frankness and clearness—qualities which were conspicuously absent from those of his predecessor. It is reassuring to learn that even with the addition of six millions on account of unsettled claims—many of which will certainly not be paid by a Reform Administration—the total of the funded and temporary debt of New-York is less by several millions than it was according to the latest exhibit of the Investigating Committee of Citizens. Mr. GREEN has steadily applied himself to paying off the Revenue Bonds as they fall due, and has not, as would have been done under Ring management, immediately converted them into an addition to the permanent debt. The existing total of the debt—$94,553,307 22—is, however, merely an approximation to the entire liabilities of the tax-payers. Several Departments of the City and County Government have failed to present a statement of the claims they have incurred, and as the close of the financial year we need not be disappointed if the state of affairs should here out to be rather less satisfactory. This, however, is one of the penalties we have to pay for being saddled, in spite of ourselves, with men like HALL and TWEED.

The "Liberal Republican Committee" of Missouri, having joined on a call with the Regular Republican Committee of the State for a common Convention to elect delegates to the National Convention, the party in Missouri may be regarded as again united. Several members of the former Liberal Committee have called another Convention for the purpose of giving some encouragement to the "passive" Democrats. They hope to prove to such Democrats as are willing to leave the Presidential field to discontented Republicans, that there are enough of the latter to take possession. Nothing can be more rash than to call their followers together. The certainty of the passage of an honesty bill, the strength of revenue reform in the dominant party in Congress, the actual initiation of Civil Service reform by the President, have very much disturbed the calculations of the proposed bolters. The sincere ones have nothing to hail from—and the tricksters have no one to bolt with.

Work Half Done.

Some of the remarks made by Mr. CHOATE last night at the annual festival of the New-England Society, will probably have the effect of turning people's attention once more to the condition of City affairs. It was, as Mr. CHOATE truly said, in one of those epochs which have given him an enviable reputation, a wholesome revival of the spirit in which the Pilgrim Fathers set about the work of government that has given rise to the recent peaceful revolution. There were some who believed that nothing short of a violent revolution would succeed in breaking down that indestructible organization known as the Tammany Ring; but we never were of that opinion. The institutions under which we live afford ample means for the redress of all wrongs. The moment the people chose to take the management of their affairs into their own hands, a fatal blow was sure to be struck at the abuses which prevailed. But Mr. CHOATE went on to offer many other reflections which were equally just. He pointed out that the fathers of New-England would long ago have put in force the severest penalties against the men who have outraged the public confidence, and would have taken their own measures to render them a terrible example to other evil-doers.

Much has been gained during the last few months—the leak in the public Treasury has been stopped; the City is not being plunged any deeper into debt; the taxes which the people pay are likely to be applied to their proper uses. Great confidence exists in the new Controller, and it is not too much to believe that we shall never again see a gang of vulgar thieves ruling this great City. But there is a dark side to the picture. We have got rid of some of the rogues, and yet two of the chief places under the City Government are still occupied by W. M. TWEED and A. OAKEY HALL—a humiliating confession to make. After the exposures which have been made, such a state of things as this could scarcely exist in any other great city on the Continent. Here is TWEED still at liberty to make large demands on the public Treasury, and to doctor the books in his Department in such a way as to cover up all traces of fraud. We gave an example yesterday of the robberies which were carried on in the Department of Parks, under the authority of PETER B. SWEENY, HENRY HILTON and "TOM" FIELDS. Similar thefts, only on a much greater scale, have undoubtedly been carried on in the Department of Public Works. But the author and instigator of them has possession of the books, and doubtless has been using his opportunities for covering up his tracks to the best of his abilities. Mayor HALL could have delivered the public from this man, but he has made no attempt to do so. He is probably afraid of interfering with TWEED, for fear that TWEED would tell what he knows about him. This, however, is no excuse for the Mayor in the eyes of the public. Having first connived at the robbery of the public, he now brings all the powers of his office to shield the thieves from justice, and to keep them in power. Had HALL been himself an honest man, he would have made every effort to expel TWEED. But, instead of that, he has protected him in every way. Perhaps even AUGUST BELMONT would find it hard to defend this. For this alone HALL deserves the execration of the public.

Again, TOM FIELDS is still a member of the Park Commission. He attends every meeting, and votes against every reform. We might ask Mr. CHOATE whether he thinks the freedom of New-England would have submitted patiently to that indignity. Had he put that question to the distinguished audience which he addressed last night, we think we know what would have been the reply. The truth is that our work is at present only half done. Can we go on allowing TWEED to remain at the head of the Public Works, or suffer HALL to be Mayor of the City? The Courts will not help us. Judge BARNARD'S fit of repentance was short-lived, as everybody supposed it would be. When the greatest thief of modern times was brought before him on a criminal charge, he released him on five thousand dollars bail—an insult to the public, which is quite worthy of BARNARD'S past career. It is not long ago that a lunatic brought a wild action against two journalists for libel. The "Judge" instantly compelled each of those journalists to find ten thousand dollars bail. Of TWEED he required only half the amount. Nothing better can be expected of BARNARD; he has always been a disgrace to the Bench, and he will die as he has lived. The Legislature alone can assist us. A few days only have to pass before that body meets. It will shock public sentiment all over the country if it does not immediately extinguish HALL and TWEED at the same time—and then proceed to remove BARNARD and CARDOZO, not to mention other Judges whose conduct calls for rigid investigation. When this is done, the implied reproach conveyed in a portion of Mr. CHOATE'S excellent address will be removed from us.

The Truth About the "Retrenchment Committee."

A weekly paper says: "Mr. TRUMBULL'S proposal to revive a committee of inquiry—a lawful body, lawfully organized, to ask lawful questions about the public affairs—has been resisted, and almost successfully resisted on two grounds—one that it would be used to injure the President's chances of renomination, to which he is presumptively entitled; the other that the proposer is a factious man, whose aims are not high." The insinuations here made are ingenious in their way. The reader is left to infer that "a committee of inquiry" was generally objected to as such, and that those Senators who believe that Gen. GRANT will make a better President than any man likely to be substituted for him, are really afraid that "a lawful body, lawfully organized, to ask lawful questions about the public affairs," would "injure his chances of renomination."

The truth is that the first demonstration of Messrs. TRUMBULL, SCHURZ and FENTON was made against an inquiry, and one of a very practical character, having a well-defined object, proposed on the first day of the session by Senator CONKLING. The inquiry suggested by Mr. CONKLING was one by a standing committee into the defalcation of Pay-master HODGE. The resolution offered by Mr. CONKLING in this connection was at once definite and of wide scope. It embraced the entire subject of defalcations, their extent, their cause, and the remedy for them. When the committee had been formed, with Senator WILSON as Chairman, and Messrs. LOGAN and BLAIR among its members, Mr. CONKLING called up his resolution of inquiry. Mr. TRUMBULL opposed it. He declared that none of the committees selected by the Senate should deal with this class of matters. He wanted, instead, a special committee, to investigate, not designated abuses, but all abuses. This certainly was a view which was open to criticism, and debate sprung up, pending which the Senate adjourned. In that debate no argument was used of the kind our contemporary speaks of, not a syllable was uttered to indicate that any Senator was afraid of the President's chances of renomination, or thought Mr. TRUMBULL a "factious man, whose aims were not high." On the contrary, Mr. MORTON expressly declared that he was in favor of a committee substantially of the character Mr. TRUMBULL proposed, though he believed a specific investigation into the Hodge case would aid, not hinder, its work. Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN pointed out very clearly that the Hodge case did not come under Mr. TRUMBULL'S resolution; and Mr. EDMUNDS showed that Mr. TRUMBULL'S proposition was largely forestalled by the fact that a committee precisely like the one asked for had already submitted a bill, (the Jenckes Civil Service bill,) and no had offered it in the Senate at its opening session, authorizing the most extended system of remedy and prevention for the evils described by Mr. TRUMBULL.

During this debate, the Senate adjourned. When the subject again came up, it did so on a proposition from Mr. ANTHONY to raise a standing Senate committee to investigate all subjects referred to it. This proposition was subsequently amended by adopting nearly the whole of Mr. TRUMBULL'S instructions, and to the committee thus formed there have been referred the general order business in the New-York Custom-house, on motion of Mr. CONKLING, Mr. SUMNER'S San Domingo inquiries, the same Senator's queries about the Semana Bay lease, and sundry other matters.

In all this, or in the proceedings on which our statement is based, no candid man can find reasonable grounds for the insinuations scattered so freely by the Journal in question. On the contrary, the history of the case shows beyond controversy that the Republican Senators as a body have provided for, not opposed, a searching investigation, and that those of them who favor Gen. GRANT'S renomination contended against Mr. TRUMBULL'S resolution, not because it was for a genuine investigating committee, nor because such a committee could injure the President, but because they deemed a standing committee, of the kind appointed, equally efficient for good, and not so liable to abuse.

The Story of a Wreck.

The number of ship-wrecks and disasters at sea is relatively far below what it formerly was. Improved marine architecture, more accurate instruments, and superior knowledge of the art of navigation, assist in keeping down the average of calamity; and the application of steam, the use of iron in ship-building—especially on the compartment principle—and the increasing stores of meteorological and topographical information within reach of the seaman, all tend to safety. Now and then, however, we hear of a catastrophe that recalls the dismal experiences of the past. Such an instance is that of the ill-fated brig Shelohoff, which was found floating water-logged in the Pacific, near the Sandwich Islands, some weeks ago. The wreck was seen one morning by the look-out on board the steam-ship Moses Taylor, from Japan, bound for San Francisco. A solitary man was taken off the brig, the only survivor of her crew and passengers. He was the Captain of the Shelohoff, LUDEK HOFKEN, and although, when rescued, he was at the very door of death, he has recovered so far as to be able to tell his story.

The Shelohoff cleared from San Francisco for Callao on the 23d of July last. Her cargo consisted of lumber, and her crew of the Captain, two mates, a steward, and four sailors. There were likewise four passengers. Rough, but not dangerous, weather attended the beginning of the passage, but on the 1st of July there was a dead calm. The master employed this in a way common on shipboard, by painting his boats and otherwise setting things in order. In clearing away for the purpose he had the hawser coiled up and stowed in the forecastle; and this act was providentially the means of saving the Captain's life and of prolonging the lives of others. On the 3d of July the ship was overtaken by heavy squalls. Canvas was rapidly shortened, until at last by nightfall the Shelohoff was under bare poles. But even this brought no safety. The wind and sea increased to prodigious violence, and it became evident that the vessel was caught in a cyclone. On the morning of the 4th of July the Shelohoff was on her beam ends, the sea making a clean breach right over her. It seemed certain that she would founder, and, but for the lumber, she doubtless would have done so. By night, with infinite labor, the masts were cut away, and the ship partially righted. But the lumber on the "tween" decks had got loose, and carried away the sky-lights, wheel-house, and companion-way, and had jammed up the entrance to the cabin. It was found that this was quite immovable, and that it was impossible to get at either provisions or water. Meanwhile the brig was filled by the sea, and her stern, where there was less lumber, had settled deeply, and was completely washed by every wave.

In this desperate condition, without food or drink, or control over their vessel, and out of the track of any probable passing sail, it is little wonder that the luckless mariners thought their case hopeless. Still, they battled vigorously for life. A barrel of tongues and pounds floated up to them. They managed to get from the hold two half barrels of salmon and a box of starch. The water-butts were stove in, and not a drop could be had from them. A sail was, however, ringed in such a way that some rain water could be caught. The lumber being lighter than the vessel, and the latter full of water, now began to swash the deck and sides somewhat, and the peril was imminent that the Shelohoff would go to pieces. At this moment the hawser came into play. It was hauled seven times around the entire hull of the brig, and the threatened danger was thus warded off. Yet, although safe for the time from drowning, the crew were now tormented by thirst. In vain the Captain begged them not to drink salt water. Some of the miserable men swallowed quantities of it. Then great boils burst out on their bodies, they were attacked by dysentery, and presently died in raging madness. In spite of all the privations endured, it was not until the 17th of October, nearly four months from the time the Shelohoff was thrown on her beam-ends, that the last survivor, except the Captain, expired. This was a passenger by the name of ASHLEY CRANE. After his death the Captain gave up all hope, and lay down, hoping soon to follow his last companion. It was ordained otherwise, for he was saved by the people of the Moses Taylor, who found him in a state of insensibility. The story of the wreck of the Shelohoff is a very pitiful one, and has a resemblance to those old-fashioned chronicles, which, for the reasons named, seldom find parallels in our own day.

Organization of the Legislature.

On two former occasions only has our party been exposed to the danger incident to an overwhelming legislative majority. When the people, after enduring wrongs and oppression, or frauds and corruptions, until "endurance ceases to be a virtue," rise in their indignant strength, their efforts always result in bringing out new and inexperienced representatives. This occurred in 1854 and in 1857. In the Assembly of 1855, by the election of an incompetent Speaker and a worthless Clerk, we lost all the advantages of our victory. In 1857, however, guided by wiser and better counsels, we paved the way, by prudent legislation, for the election of Gov. SEWARD in 1838, and of President HARRISON in 1840.

We now have a large and inexperienced majority in both branches of the Legislature. Everything useful to the State and creditable to the Republican Party depends upon the action of the coming Legislature. Its organization, therefore, is a delicate and difficult, but most responsible duty. The Press, so far as it seeks to influence the question, should endeavor to enlighten rather than mislead members of the Legislature. For Clerk of the Senate, three persons have been named. Two (JAMES TERWILLIGER and S. P. ALLEN) are gentlemen of unquestionable character and ability, both have served in that capacity with honor and usefulness, and either would make in the present emergency an excellent Clerk. Mr. ALLEN, however, declines—leaving the field to Mr. TERWILLIGER, in whom all the Republicans of the State, Mr. GREELEY excepted, have confidence. We have no candidates to nominate for any office—but we are very anxious to see the fruits of the people's victory properly secured. This can only be done by the selection of the very best men for all posts of responsibility.

A Progressive Institution.

The recent purchase, by the Boston Young Men's Christian Association, of the Studio Building, in that city, for $415,000, as a permanent base of operations, furnishes new evidence that the Christian Association movement in the United States is quietly assuming important proportions. There are, it is estimated, nearly one thousand of these societies, with a membership of not much less than 150,000 young men in the United States and the British Provinces. In the main, all these societies are inspired by a vigorous religious aim of the aggressive sort, and each, in its own field, and in the fulfillment of its special mission, is a powerful auxiliary of the Protestant Church. It could hardly be otherwise when we consider that the membership is composed of the active, liberal, working element in the churches, and this without reference to denominational distinctions. The past history of the Christian Association movement fully justifies the assertion that these societies combine, in a greater degree than any other religious agency, those desirable constituent elements—catholicity, economy, sympathy, originality, progressiveness, efficiency and vitality. This is a strong claim, but the record is an open one, and clearly bears us out in making it.

Besides the local influence and work of each of these associations, however, there is an element of strength possessed by them in the Union by which all the societies on this continent accept the leadership of a general executive committee, appointed by their delegates in annual conventions, under whom State committees and corresponding members act in an advisory capacity all over the country for the furtherance of the enterprise. By this network of far reaching administration, all the associations are kept in a condition of fraternal rivalry in doing good, weak societies are encouraged and aided, dying ones revived, and new ones continually called into active existence. Amid all this machinery of organization, which includes traveling agents, and the publication of a monthly organ, there is no assumption of authority over individual associations, except so far as the same is invested, by the Conventions, in the General Executive Committee. And as such authority is delegated, if at all, by the formal vote of regularly chosen representatives, from almost all the important societies, there is no fear of any very dangerous centralization.

These associations, moreover, are rapidly getting hold of the purse-strings of the benevolent, not only in the Church, but outside of it. For their work is so largely humanitarian that capital recognises its conservative power, and vies with religion in sustaining an institution which does so much for the stranger, the unemployed, the tempted, and even the vicious. Thus, buildings are being raised all over the country for the permanent use of these societies, as a base of active aggressive operations which tend to the benefit of the entire community. The latest reports to which we have access give the number of association buildings already erected as twenty-one; but, to our knowledge, several have since been added. Twenty-one associations, besides, have building funds of larger or smaller amounts. These buildings and building funds, in July, aggregated in value $1,940,301, and the new Boston purchase adds another half million dollars to this valuation. So that we have nearly two and a half million dollars permanently invested as a working capital in the Christian Association enterprise.

Wood for the Poor.

The intense cold which has followed the late storm recalls to every charitable mind the suffering of the poor. Many causes will combine to make this one of the hardest Winters for many years. The failing of so many savings banks alone, one of the bitterest fruits of Ring rascality, will bear cruelly on a large class of our people. We trust that the more fortunate among us will not now be stinted in their generosity. We have many deserving and efficient associations for relieving the distresses of poverty, to which we have heretofore called attention. A gift to any of these would, we are sure, be gratefully acknowledged and properly applied. One could certainly bestow no more gracious Christmas gift. But there still seems room for some plan of relief more comprehensive, if not more practical, than any of these societies appear to have adopted. What is wanted more than anything else is a soup-house in some central situation, where simple food could be served out at cost prices to those who could pay at all, or for nothing to those who could not. There was, if we mistake not, perhaps is still, such a place in Berlin, where a good dinner could be had for a few cents. Some years ago a similar enterprise was maintained by a benevolent gentleman of this City at his own expense. Concerted action on the part of the many poor associations in New-York, together with such aid as would freely come from private charity, once the thing were started, might carry out the design on an efficient scale. Who is to have the honor of beginning it?

Something New in Life Insurance.

We notice, in an English insurance paper of recent date, an announcement which gives promise of something both new and practical in life insurance. After a year of preliminary preparation, mostly devoted to getting together fifty thousand pounds as a capital, the "Positive Life Assurance Company" is ready to do business. Most people will think the name selected a rather odd one, considering the lack of positiveness which usually attaches to anything in the life insurance line outside of its self-assertion, and the demands it makes upon one's purse. But, for once, there is something in a name, and this new Company has a plan which justifies its calling itself "Positive." Being novel in England, we may safely assume that this plan is also unknown here, and, therefore, we shall enter into a few particulars with regard to it.

The opinion has been gaining ground during the past few years in England, that, as at present conducted, life insurance is going into a decline. What with failures (and very heavy ones, too,) every little while among the companies, the needless and unfair conditions of life policies, the cloud of uncertainty which overhangs their final payment when due, and the continual disputes which clog settlements—the business of life insurance seems to be going behind-hand, and popular distrust is taking the place of the old favor. The unfortunate condition in which the European's policy-holders—some twenty-five thousand in number—find themselves and their forty amalgamated companies, only adds fuel to this flame of discontent, and now that the European is shown to be four or five million dollars short of being solvent, the public feeling is full of distrust.

The new "Positive" Company proposes to change all this, and by a very simple process. It has arranged a system by which every premium paid purchases an absolute, non-forfeitable property, which belongs to the assured, and which is always available to him. As explained by the Company's prospectus, this kind of insurance is entirely free from the perils of policy forfeiture under any circumstances whatsoever. It does not necessitate the continuance of paying premiums longer than the assured desires. He can cease doing so at will, and enjoy the same proportionate benefits for each premium paid, whether few or many. All this is effected by giving in return for every premium paid a negotiable note, payable to bearer three months after the death of the party insured. The amount of this note depends upon the sum insured, and the number of years during which the premiums are to be paid. These notes, being made payable to bearer, and each one being independent of those previously or afterward issued, and unaffected by subsequent neglect to pay premiums, are complete instruments, and transferable by simple delivery. Now, here is no policy fettered by conditions; no reference to applications; no chance to dispute or defer payment on account of alleged misrepresentations made years ago, but a clear promise to pay, which cannot be, and is not intended to be, repudiated. Could anything seem simpler or fairer?

Nor are these the only features entitling this plan to be called Positive. They also represent a fixed value even while the assured is living. Whoever holds them can obtain at any time after three days' notice, a loan upon them of an amount equal to forty per cent of the premium paid on the notes. Here, it will be seen, is a point indicating an element of popularity about this plan which no other present plan possesses. There is no room here for discussing surrender values, and haggling about the worth or worthlessness of a lapsed policy. The insured knows just what he is doing when he goes into the transaction. He obtains his insurance for a fixed price, for a fixed time, and the note given him is always worth forty per cent of its face, even if he never pays another shilling. This feature will commend itself without much shed of argument.

It is proper to add that security is made a speciality, so to speak, of the positive plan, by a deposit in the hands of trustees, (one of whom is THOMAS HUGHES,) of eighty per cent of the premium which are to be invested in Government stocks; and these deposits are withdrawable only when needed to pay the notes as they mature by the death of the insured. This would seem to round off the new plan completely. If there is any such "Positive" life insurance company in the United States we have never heard of it, and, if not, what an opening it presents for unemployed talent!

MINOR TOPICS.

JOHN J. BRADLEY makes a very lame reply to Controller GREEN'S letter. He says that he never claimed that the interest on the public moneys should be considered as the property of the Chamberlain. It will be remembered that he claimed special credit for admitting them to be the property of the City. Mr. BRADLEY wisely abstains from pointing out where the difference between the two positions lies. His rather muddled attempt to show how very essential it is to keep City deposits and the interest on them in separate accounts, will, doubtless, be satisfactorily disposed of by the Controller. In his list of subordinates he rather unaccountably omits to define the duties of JAMES M. SWEENY, late Deputy Chamberlain, with a salary of ten thousand dollars a year. How the notorious brother of PETER B. continued to act as Deputy Chamberlain, Clerk of the Superior Court, Commissioner on Street Openings, and to manage other capacities besides, is a mystery to the public, and Ends, unfortunately, no elucidation at the hands of JOHN J. BRADLEY. Perhaps the man who drew salaries as Chamberlain, County Treasurer, and Commissioner of the Sinking Fund, while acting as State Senator, and running a livery-stable, could not find much to wonder at in the versatility of his subordinates.

"E. M." sends us $2 for the benefit of the Children's Aid Society. We entreat all who desire that the City waifs enroll for by this most deserving charity should enjoy a merry Christmas to send contributions for the same purpose either to the office or to Mr. C. L. BRACE, No. 19 East Fourth-street, the Secretary of the Society. A dollar given to an institution like this is sure to be more fruitful of good than twenty bestowed in indiscriminating alms. Mr. BRACE will also receive subscriptions either in food or money for the purpose of giving the newsboys of the Eleventh Ward their usual Christmas dinner. We feel assured that the simple mention of the fact that the prospects of those little fellows eating their annual treat are at present rather slim, will be sufficient to induce the market men and other residents of the east side to furnish either the necessary supply of turkey or the money wherewith to purchase it.

It is not easy to appreciate the full significance of the question of a transfer of the sittings of the French National Assembly from Versailles to Paris. It is a question, however, involving a good deal more than appears on its face. So long as the Assembly persists in refusing to trust themselves within the capital, as one of their Committees has just recommended, so long will it be apparent that the conservative policy of the Provincial delegates is supreme. A repetition of the coup d'état of the 16th of September, 1870, is, of course, the danger which the majority of the Deputies appear to dread. On the other hand, by remaining at Versailles the Assembly gives the Reds a good popular grievance to champion in Paris, and it moreover lays itself open to the charge of being unpatriotic enough to distrust the attachment to law and order of a powerful section of the sovereign people.

While it is pointed out that there is no sentence in the message of President THIERS to which the Germans can object, there is much in that document to suggest caution. M. THIERS asks to be permitted to create an immense army, and to lay out large sums on the frontier defenses. He demands that every Frenchman shall be liable to service in time of war, and he announces with significant emphasis that most friendly relations exist between France and Russia. These things cannot be described as menaces to Germany; but certainly they refer to the possibility of fighting Germany again, if they refer to anything. The new German Army bill and the message of President THIERS point to the same contingency, and the latter is the natural reply to the former. Neither France nor Germany wishes to be construed as threatening the other; but each wishes the other distinctly to understand that preparation is to be made for all possible emergencies.

The astronomers say that the late explosion in the sun buried fifty miles deep to the height of over two hundred thousand miles; and that the huge protuberance which rose some fifteen thousand miles above the "chromosphere," and subsequently burst, was composed of hydrogen gas. If such an unexpected abolition as this can take place, who knows what may happen next, or whether another and more tremendous catastrophe may not blow the sun himself to atoms, and relegate us all to "Chaos and old Night!" The intimate knowledge we are promised of the sun's "corona" would be of little use if followed by such an event as this, and it is to be hoped that the world will soon receive scientific assurance that the recent disturbance was purely of a gaseous or ephemeral order, and not at all likely to herald the destruction of the solar system.

Six thousand Communists are to be sent at once to New-Caledonia. It is said that great activity exists in consequence on that lonely island, to the population at which even forçats are regarded as welcome additions. New-Caledonia, like St. Helena, is said to be a spot from which it is impossible to escape. The military

Paris for this purpose. New-Caledonia has a more stable government than the Commune of Paris. It is a sure connection, and has never changed, let the revolutions at home be what they might. Although there is an autocratic "Council of Administration," consisting of two officials from France and two of the leading inhabitants, the Governor of the island rules supreme; and it would certainly appear that there is not too great a compensation for living in one of the most desolate places on the face of the earth.

We have never claimed to have the best Police in the world, but we may be excused, we trust, for the pardonable degree of skill displayed by one of the Roman correspondents. This functionary, who is said to be present in collusion and high favor at the Court, suggests a curious theory. Unhappily, a number of his dispatches about Rome have not the greatest point. He has yet to mark the resignation of his department. One fine day the troublesome Jesuits disappeared, some dying suddenly, others being hastened by other means, until ten or three had been put out of the way. If anything was going surreptitiously, when somebody blundered. One of the Jesuits escaped, and exposed the plot in Count BONCOMPAGNI, the head of the department. The good Count, however, declared to interviewers, such pettiness being apparently reckoned among the perquisites of the Roman Police, just as here our detectives consider themselves rewarded to an extraordinary extension from a hundred or hundred-dollar. The last item appealed to the Czar, and the Russian view of Turkish will probably postpone the fate of his ministers supposed to gather to the last moment.

A Parisian journal, in an obituary of the late Lord CHANCELLOR, observes that he was one of the most distinguished lawyers in England, and that he once fought with TOM SAYERS, the husband of ADAH MENKEN. The result of this conflict is represented in something like a "draw," the combatants having punished each other "reciprocally to a lamentable condition," and having been forcibly separated after a forty minutes' engagement. Of course, the whole story is a tissue of blunders, as Mr. J. C. HEENAN, who is now in London, can readily attest; and the Parisian writer knows no more of the matter than that distinguished master of "le boxe" professes to know of the status vouchers. There are some subjects that Frenchmen cannot even approach without falling into absurd mistakes, and this suffix is among the number.

Condition of the Coal Trade—The Miners' Resistance.

From the Munch Chronik (Munich) Gazette, Dec. 10.

Up to the close of last week, there has been unprecedented rush from here, over from railroads and the canal, since the 1st of January, 4,140,279.16 tons. Last week the shipments from here amounted to 95,264.12 tons, being 2,320 tons more than the preceding week. The corresponding week last year 105,783.13 tons were sent south from here, and the total for last year to this time was 4,543,441.06 tons. In comparing the shipments of the past week and the present year with corresponding dates of last year, we find a decrease for the week of 7,577 of 10,519.01 tons, and a decrease for the present year of 403,162.12 tons.

There was a slight improvement in grade, but the closing of navigation east will be apt to put a stop to it. The cold weather will have a great effect upon the market, but it will be temporary. There is some coal being taken along the line, this week, and the assortment shipped. After the first of January, we look for a large office and expect a better market, though upon just what grounds nobody can state. Notwithstanding the low price of coal, we do not believe the most want to turn out. We have seen enough there a great deal this week, and from what we can learn we believe they will work all Winter, in this region. This is satisfactory, and we have no doubt but that it will be satisfied that this course is the wise one.

In the Schuylkill and Wyoming regions there may be a turn-out next month, though there is nothing yet definitely decided on. There was a marked decline in prices for December in Schuylkill, and if they again fall in January, it will be almost impossible for men or operators to work and make any money. Already some contracts in Northumberland Co. are suspended one half time, and others are idle altogether. This is the case, to some extent, in all the regions, and in the case of the smaller shipments. The Board of Arbitration at the Lehigh region met on Wednesday at Hazleton, and unanimously agreed that the rate of wages of the present year should be the same as last year. The rate will not be taken up as much as it is feared for this year. Had the Lehigh Valley Railroad carried as much as it did last year, we would have had a large increase, as the Lehigh and Susquehanna will have transported up to the close of most week about 500,000 tons more than last year, which is largely in excess of any previous season.

Stockholders' Prosecution in Virginia.

The Richmond Dispatch speaks decidedly of the material prospects of Virginia, asserting that the productions of the State have thriven instead every year since the war. To show this it gives figures extracted from its own statistical columns, in relation to wheat and tobacco, and says:

"The receipts by canal give an idea of the production of tobacco in the James River Valley—showing for five years before and five years after the war as near as may be equally heavily laden. In the former period, the receipts for five years before and five years since the war is as sixty-seven to forty-five. This decrease of a hogshead of tobacco is now what it was formerly. But now, every tub that is sent to market is loaded with tobacco as reported and thereby counted twice. As to wheat, the distinction is still greater—the production for five years since the war being as one to four what it was for the five previous to the war. If 1866 and '67 were the years of the greatest wheat crop ever raised by the then undivided line from Northern Alabama and East Tennessee. The last crop was an almost entire failure in that district, and the receipts fell off half, leaving us to our own poverty. So great was this that the Richmond millers were compelled to buy cargoes of wheat at the North to keep their establishments going to fill out their orders. The above homes, barns and similar objects are as largely into the wealth and comfort of every community—have diminished at a greater ratio than the leading staples."

The Wisconsin Election—Official Returns.

The following are the footings of the vote for State officers in Wisconsin, Nov. 7, as officially canvassed:

Republican.		Democratic.
Governor, Washburn	73,301	Doolittle	68,151
Lt. Governor, Pratt	77,781	Rice	67,641
Secretary, Bennett	77,705	Hinze	68,041
Treasurer, Hoyt	78,060	Hinze	68,117
Att'y General, Parker	77,888	Bright	68,202
Supt. Public Instruction, Pickard	77,878	Johnson	68,202
Judge Supreme Court, Cole	77,878	Johnson	68,202
Court Commis'r, Johnson	78,176	Bolens	68,202

Alluding to these figures, the Milwaukee Sentinel says:

"It will be seen that Mr. HAZE gallantly leads the column, although the Democratic newspapers repeatedly assured the public before the election that he was certain to be beaten in consequence of the disaffection of the Germans. The close average vote, however, is noticeable. Had anything else occurred to draw off this party, and how little affected our voters are by incidental and local questions."

The Forests and Lakes of Maine.

The whole area of the State of Maine is about 30,000 miles, of which the great primeval northern forest contains over 20,000 square miles. It is largely composed of tall pines. There are about 1,800 lakes in the State, covering nearly 2,000 square miles. Nearly all these lakes lie at the head of rivers which run to the sea, and their great altitude gives to their descending water an immense power. Moosehead Lake is 1,000 feet, and Lakes Umbagog and Moosehead are each over 1,000 feet above the level of the sea, and the whole surface of the State is, on an average, one foot in elevation; so that the water of all the lakes and rivers must find the ocean. The Commissioner estimates the total water-power of the State to be equal to the combined working energy of 34,000,000 men, laboring night and day, all the year round, or, counting that which is available, exceeding the united working power of all the men in the United States, England, France and Germany.

ARRIVAL OF GEN. SICKLES

His Reception by a Delegation of the Third Army Corps.

An Interview with Him—Our Relations with Spain of a Friendly Character—

The Cuban Question.

Major-Gen. SICKLES and his Spanish bride arrived in this City yesterday morning by the steamer Cuba, of the Cunard line. The ship had a long and stormy passage, which was considered by the General, however, without serious inconvenience. Mrs. SICKLES was less fortunate, and found her cabin the most comfortable place during a great part of the voyage. Both the General and Mrs. SICKLES terminate the voyage in excellent health and spirits.

A deputation of the Third Army Corps United sent the Cuba at Queenstown, in the United States revenue cutter Northwind, and there extended the General a cordial welcome home. The deputation consisted of Brig.-Gen. Mosgrave, Assistant Paymaster Major W. W. HUDLESON, Gen. F. D. MCSHERRY, Col. STEWART, Major TAYLOR and several others. The General and Mrs. SICKLES were taken aboard the Northwind at Queenstown, and came up to the City in her, the time being consumed in a pleasant interchange of greetings and the enjoyment of a liberal collation, provided by the Union. The Northwind landed her party at the foot of Christopher-street, where carriages were in waiting to convey the General and his bride to the Brevoort House, where apartments had been engaged for them. They reached the hotel about noon, and remained quietly in their rooms the rest of the day, receiving the congratulations of their many friends.

In the evening the General received a reporter of The Times, with whom he entered into a leisurely conversation on the questions relating to his mission and the relations existing between this country and Spain.

REPORTER—Your return to this country, General, is variously interpreted, and the public are very anxious to KNOW if it has any political significance.

GEN. SICKLES—I have not yet seen or read any of the speculations or comments of the journals in reference to my visit. There is, however, nothing in the relations between the United States and Spain, so far as I know, which should occasion any uneasiness. All the pending questions which I have left unsettled, or which I have had charge, have yielded to diplomatic assurance and assertions, and judging from what I know of the disposition of the Spanish Government, and the moderation evinced by our own, I have no apprehensions for the future.

REPORTER—At the moment of the announcement of your return to this country it was popularly reported that our relations with Spain were in a delicate situation, because of what was supposed to be a failure on the part of Spain to fulfill certain agreements with our Government in the conduct of the war in Cuba. What foundation was there for such reports?

GEN. SICKLES—None whatever. The Minister to the Ministry in March 4, of which I think there have been eight since my official residence at that Court, combined with the unsettled condition of affairs in the country, the establishment of a new dynasty, and the introduction of a new Constitution, have delayed the inauguration of any new and important colonial policy, to which the Liberal Party in Spain is committed by repeated pledges made to the United States through official channels. These difficulties have likewise deferred the fulfillment of equally solemn though less formal engagements made in Spain by the Liberal leaders to their own constituents. The truth is that with these unsettled questions, and the unprecedented embarrassment of the exchequer, there is hardly power heathen enough to brook that unsupported as they have been by a working majority in the Spanish Congress, owing to the multitude of factions into which that body is divided, very little has been done in the way of colonial reform. The Spanish Minister, Señor MUÑOZ, has been down in the city of Washington, and has had a newspaper, for the past three years as appropriation that has passed the Spanish Cortes. And although several loans for very large amounts have been raised, neither the Congress nor the country is yet informed of the terms upon which they were negotiated or the disposition made of the proceeds.

REPORTER—Do you attribute the anarchy that reigns in Cuba and the inhumane conduct of the war against the insurgents in that island to this cause?

GEN. SICKLES—I am not aware of any ground of complaint made by Spain against the United States. On the contrary, the cordial Spanish feelings with which I have had relations have been met with which our Government has performed all the international obligations and duties growing out of the struggle in Cuba.

REPORTER—Is there any truth in the report that you have been retained by the English shareholders of the Erie Railroad Company to prosecute their interests in this country, as against the present management of the Erie Railroad?

GEN. SICKLES—None at all. When I was in England I met some of these gentlemen, who consulted with me in regard to their affairs, but beyond that there is nothing in the report. When I shall have completed the public business I have called me home, and which my duties as Minister to Spain detain me here indefinitely, I expect to return immediately to Madrid.

The General will remain in the City until after the Holidays, as he is informed that Secretary FISH is to spend the Christmas season at Rosedale. He will then repair to Washington. The Third Corps Union have tendered him a banquet during the time he is detained here, previously to which Mr. SICKLES desires that it be said that he would decline that if it had any political significance; but as the Union consists of his old officers and soldiers, he cannot forego the pleasure of meeting them in a social reunion.

CHRISTMAS PREPARATIONS.

Dinners to be Given at the Charitable Institutions—Contributions Wanted.

The charitable institutions, according to annual custom, will provide liberal entertainments for the destitute poor and homeless children of this City on Christmas Day. Many thousands of people will sit down to a generous dinner, provided for them by the liberality of our citizens, and considerable money will be spent in rendering the day a happy and welcome one to the inmates of our numerous asylums.

FIVE POINTS HOUSE OF INDUSTRY.

Christmas Day will be kept at the Five Points House of Industry in the usual style. There will be services in the chapel at noon, a dinner for the children and the out-door pensioners at 1 P. M., and services in the afternoon from 3 o'clock till 4. The exercises will consist of singing and recitations by the children. A Christmas tree will be a feature of the occasion, and toys, books, dolls, &c., enough to supply 400 expectant little ones will have to be furnished. Donations of articles suitable for the Christmas Tree will be gladly received by the Superintendent of the House. A cordial invitation is extended to all who can find time to pay the little ones a visit, and see the inner workings of what may be truly termed a "House of Industry."

HOWARD MISSION.

The managers of the Howard Mission make an earnest appeal for their little ones on Christmas Day. The dinner will be served at 12 M., and the exercises will begin at noon. The giving out of presents, &c., will commence immediately afterward, and the doors will be closed at 8. The average daily attendance at the Mission schools has been 261; at the Sunday-school, 295 and about 400 children sit down to table daily. About $30,000 is required for the support of the Mission for the coming year, and for this sum the managers must rely almost entirely on voluntary contributions. The sum of $50 will support a child in the institution for a year. All who desire to visit the Mission on Christmas Day are cordially invited to attend.

EMIGRANTS' REFUGE, WARD'S ISLAND.

A beautiful feast will be provided for the destitute at this charitable asylum, by the Commissioners of Emigration. On Monday last 1,900 exiles were living on the island, and it is expected that by Christmas day the number will have materially increased. Dinner will be provided at 1 o'clock for about 2,500 people, and will consist of roast turkeys, beef, pudding and the usual concomitants of charitable feasts.

NEWS-BOYS' LODGING-HOUSES.

The principal home of the news-boys, in Park-place, is busy with preparations for the generous feast to be given on Christmas Day. The large store-room yesterday presented an enlivening sight. An immense ox was being cut up into suitable roasting and boiling pieces, to grace the dinner-table. Christmas beings no treat to the news-boys, for at these feasts they take place at the fashionable hour of 5½ P. M., when 300 boys, after their hard day's work, are expected to sit down to a bounteous dinner, consisting of the before-mentioned beef, hams, pies, fruit, and other luxuries. As the compilation of the dinner is miscellaneous entertainment will be given by the boys themselves, comprising singing and recitation; and as a newsboy will deliver an appropriate and humorous address.

RANDALL'S ISLAND NURSERY.

Preparations of a most extensive kind are going on at this institution for the coming Christmas festival. In addition to the Holiday dinner, which will be prepared for 900 little ones, a special feast is to be provided for the sick and convalescent children. This portion of the proceedings will be superintended by Mrs. A. H. GIBBONS, who for twenty years has furnished a Christmas tree, and appropriate Holiday gifts for the little patients. A concert will take place in the evening in the large hall of the asylum, when some excellent music will be rendered by a well-trained chorus of 400 voices. Many prominent gentlemen and patrons of the institution will be present, and the nature of the entertainment generally is expected to attract a large number of visitors. The Commissioners of Charities and Correction, who have charge of the Randall's Island Nursery, assumes also that their Christmas almshouse, lunatic asylums and charity hospitals will each be provided with an appropriate Christmas treat.

NEW-YORK JUVENILE ASYLUM.

This well-known and meritorious institution will furnish a Christmas feast and entertainment of unusual magnitude this year. The President, Mr. A. R. WETMORE, with his usual liberality, will provide the dinner for the children at the Asylum, to the number of about 600, and 100 more will sit down to dinner at the House of Reception, in East Thirteenth-street. A Christmas tree will be furnished for each place, the presents and toys for which are furnished by the volunteer teachers of these establishments. At the Asylum, One Hundred and Seventy-sixth-street, a miscellaneous concert will take place in the evening, the instrumental music being furnished by the juvenile cornet band. Mr. PETTIGRAIN is expected to be present, and address his little friends.

CHILDREN'S AID SOCIETY.

All the lodging-houses of this Society will furnish special entertainments on Christmas day. Wholesome and bountiful dinners will be provided for the juveniles, and at some of the houses [concerts and amusements of various kinds will be organized, by the children themselves. In addition to the Newsboy's Home already mentioned, there are four houses of refuge under the care of the Society, and it is fully expected that over 1,000 children of both sexes will participate in the various feasts provided by the Society for them. The Girls' Lodging-house, in 56 Market-place, is to be especially well catered for, as several charitable ladies of the neighborhood have determined to relieve the Society of this house for the day, and will entertain their little protegés in their own appropriate and generous style.

OTHER INSTITUTIONS.

A Christmas dinner will be furnished to the inmates of the Female Guardian Society, No. 29 East Twenty-ninth-street. Divine service will be held there during the day, and appropriate sacred music will be sung by the girls.

At the Protestant Half-orphan Asylum, West Twenty-third-st., about 150 people will sit down to a hearty dinner provided by Mrs. J. M. BRADLEY. Christmas presents and toys will be distributed during the evening.

Christmas in Brooklyn.

Preparations are being made in all the churches for the due celebration of Christmas. In St. Peter's Protestant Episcopal Church, Rev. A. PADDOCK, D. D., Rector, the Sunday-school anniversary will be held at 7½ P. M., at which there will be singing of carols and addresses made. Christmas morning at 11, the usual services and the following musical Anthems: "There were Shepherds;" "Venite," manuscripts; 1. Gloria Patri, manuscripts; 2. Gloria Patri, GUNTHER; 3. Gloria Patri, air from CONCONE'S Mass in F; Te Deum, LLOYD; Benedictus, GUNTHER; Gloria Tibi, Church Choir; Hymn 45, G. W. WARREN. After the sermon, "Dost thou Weep?" Miss STOTHARD; Church Choir; Hymn 96, Christmas; Gloria in Excelsis, old, choir; Miss STOTHARD, first soprano; Miss TILTON, first alto; Mr. DYE, first bass; Mr. JAMES BOGLE, Jr., first tenor; Mr. H. E. HUDDLESON, organist and conductor.

At St. Ann's P. E. Church, on the Heights, Rev. Dr. HUTTON, Rector, the usual services on Christmas morning will commence at 10½, with an organ prelude, Chopin; Adeste Fidelis, solos and chorus, Novello; Cantique de Noel, soprano solo; Grand Venite, Est, solos and chorus; Gloriæ in C, F and G, Est; Grand Te Deum in C, Lorets, Jr., solos and chorus, Hard and solos; Jubilate in C, Lorets, Jr., chorus with boys; Psalm 46, Carl Wagner, chorus; Gloria Tibi in B, Lorets, Jr., chorus; Hymn 46, old, by congregation and choir; Offertory Hymn, Lorets, Jr., alto solo, and female chorus, the words being by Rev. George T. Packard, assistant minister of St. Ann's; Agnus Dei, Mass in C, Lorets, Jr.; alto, soprano solo, and grand chorus; Tar Sanctum A minor, Lorets, Jr.; soprano solo and chorus; Communion Hymn; No. 350; "Gloria in Excelsis," Samuel Jackson; closing Hymn, "Holy Night;" organ voluntary; choir, Miss Scoccia, prima donna, Mrs. Christianson, contralto; Mr. Chauncey Ives, Del. Mace, tenor solo; Mr. A. C. Lorets, bass solo, and others; chorus and boys; Mr. Oueish, harpist; Mr. J. M. Lorets, Jr., organist; Mr. Carl Wagner, assistant organist.

At Elm-place Congregational Church, Rev. HENRY POWERS, Pastor, the following is the order of exercises at this church to-morrow:

Te Deum	Mercantile
Christmas Anthem, "Hark! the Herald Angels Sing"	Dudley Buck
"Hark! the Herald Angels Sing"	Martin
Gloria Patri	Mercantile
Chorus, "Glorious Things"	Ch. Ground
"Hark! What Mean Those Holy Voices"	Bost
Gloria Patri	Martin
Chant (Supplementary)	Martin

Choir—Miss MARY LOUISE SEGUR, soprano; Mrs. J. B. HOPKINS, contralto; Mr. S. H. MUNSON, tenor and leader; Mr. IVAN E. MORAWSKI, basso; Mr. B. D. FISHER, organist.

At Fleet-street M. E. Church a grand concert and entertainment will be given on Christmas night by the choir and Sunday-school of this Church, in aid of the Sunday-school. Several eminent musical personages have offered to assist in the programme. There will be a choice and extended variety of musical selections presented, including songs, duetts, quartettes and choruses. Recitations of a pleasing character will also be given, the whole making a very stirring conclusion to the festivities of the day.

FOREIGN NEWS NOTES.

The Scotsman understands that during the present session twenty-eight ladies have matriculated at the University of Edinburgh, and that of these ten are studying for the medical profession.

The following advertisement appears in Galignani's Messenger: "A French nobleman, aged forty-five, widower, without children, desires to make home in his family with an English or American lady, whether a widow or not, who speaks a little French or Italian, and has a yearly income of £1,000. For all particulars write in English or French, to, &c."

The Levant Times says: "The supplementary two and a half per cent., levied in addition to the tithe of ten per cent., has been abolished by a special order of the Sultan. This measure will be a great relief to the agricultural industry of the Empire. During the continuance of the dearth at Tripoli, in Barbary, the Imperial Government has extended the exemption from import duty to flour and beans as well as grain."

The damage done by the fire which occurred on the 8th inst. in the Magazins des Louvres, will not exceed $125,000. The fire was caused by the imprudence of one of the gas company's workmen, who was repairing the gas-pipes. The French insurance companies interested intend to recover their losses from the gas company.

An action to recover possession of a picture wrongfully detained had been tried in the Court of Queen's Bench, in London. It was painted by Sir JOSHUA REYNOLDS, and was valued at 2,000 guineas. The plaintiff was an unmarried daughter of the late Sir JOHN DEAN PAUL, Bart., formerly a banker in the Strand, and the defendant, who was connected with the Paul family by marriage with a nephew of the late Archdeacon HARE. The jury returned a verdict for the defendant.

The Lucerne correspondent of the Swiss Times, writing on the 30th ult., states that the funeral obsequies of the Prince of GIRGENTI took place with all the pomp which the limited circumstances of the place would permit. All that display for which the Roman Catholic Church shows such predilection on such occasions, so dear to the Italians, was manifested. The body of the unfortunate Prince was deposited in the vault at Marnahilf; after a time, very probably it will be transferred to some place of sepulture of the BOURBONS.

The London Tablet says: "The Emperor of Brazil purposes to leave Rome for Geneva on the 10th inst., and to reach Paris on the 13th or 14th. His Majesty contemplates a stay of five weeks in France. When the Emperor and Empress were at Naples they visited the Azure Grotto. The Empress remained outside in a yawl on the sea, being rough at the time. Her Majesty was seated beside the helmsman, when he let the handle of the rudder slip from his hand. In leaning over to catch it he lost his balance and fell overboard. Just as he was disappearing the Empress caught hold him, and succeeded in saving his life."

It is stated by the Patrie that the French Government intends to establish depots in Paris in which will be concentrated the necessary stores for the great fortifications that are to be constructed in the Department of the Seine as well as in the twenty-four other departments, which will contribute in a direct manner to the defence of the capital. "The exderience obtained during the last war will not be lost," it adds, "and Paris, as is well known, is to be fortified according to new system, to which will prevent it from being invested any more, and consequently from being besieged.

The Sicilian journals give an account of an atrocious murder just committed in that island. M. PLACIDO ARNATO, living in Castel di Ludo, near Messina, went out about 4 o'clock in the afternoon, but had not gone far when he was stopped by twelve mounted and armed brigands. They detained him until 1 o'clock in the morning, when they commuted him to go to the town and instructed him to knock at his brother's house. He did so, but as soon as he heard some one about to open the door he cried out, "Keep all fast or you will be murdered!" The bandits immediately fired all their guns at him, and he was covered with wounds, but remained alive. A neighbor, on hearing the detonations, having opened his window and looked out, two bullets struck him in the forehead and killed him. The robbers then moved off, leaving M. ARNATO on the pavement. One of his wounds was in the thigh. The limb has been amputeted, but no hopes are entertained of his recovery.

The horror of the famine in Persia has not yet reached its climax. Major S. A. SMITH, assistant resident, writing from Bushire, says the people are worn to skeletons, the children "to be handled beasts." Scarce of them are trampled trodden down and killed in the daily rush for the English rice. Mr. A. J. S. ADAMS, traveling in Teheran about two months ago, says, in a note published by the Sunderland Times, that in the crowds who swarm in the barrack-square to receive a dole of small silver from the Shah, hundreds, men and women, are often partly stark naked, torn to rags by the long and severe winter. The people follow the visitor howling for bread; two men lie upon the ground, quite dead, and a third is laid upon one side of the bazaar, covered with a piece of dirty cotton. A naked woman lies in the agony of death, surrounded by a crowd of beings almost as badly off as herself. The next form is that of a woman, who scrapes from the ground a handful of maize-seed and filth, which she divides between her two children." This is one morning's ride. There is no help for any of them, though the Shah has—as Mr. MURRAY testifies—bucketsful of jewels in the private treasury, and the famine cannot end until July.

Parisian Feeling Toward Napoleon.

To illustrate the feeling entertained by some of the Parisians toward LOUIS NAPOLEON, the Boston Transcript says: "The two-sous pieces of French money are stamped with the head of LOUIS NAPOLEON, surrounded with the emblem 'NAPOLEON III., Empereur,' and the date. In one of these pieces, now before us, an engraver has very skillfully put a Prussian helmet upon the head and engraved an iron collar around the neck, with the ominous word 'Sedan' upon it."

Brentano's.

BRENTANO'S immense store in Union-square is always full of novelties, but now that the Holiday season is upon us, we find such an assortment of new books and periodicals there as cannot, we think, be equaled elsewhere, certainly not surpassed. There is no Christmas annual published which BRENTANO does not receive, and if, perchance, he should not have it in his store when you call for it, he will procure it for you as quickly as railroad or steam-boat can bring it. BRENTANO attends to business himself. Although he has a first-rate staff of clerks and assistants, he knows well that the eye of the master "overseeth all," and that we must keep to our business if we would have it keep us. His store is consequently one of the best arranged and conducted in the City. Of newspapers, foreign and domestic, from the dignified London Times to the little Echos de Paris, and of magazines from the Revue de Deux Mondes to Harper's and the Galaxy, there are no end. Here too may be found all the art, scientific, fashion and sporting journals of the world, with all the illustrated papers and new novels, and among those specially adapted for Holiday reading we may mention Boston's Christmas Annual, the Quiver, World of Fashion, Belgravia Annual, Tinsley's Magazine, Once a Week, Bow Bells, Fairyland Magazine, Children's Friend, the Children's Press, and a variety of illustrated almanacs.

A Shot Through the Leg.—The residences of L. P. Myers, Esq., Clifton, and Samuel Barton, Esq., Garrison, were saved from burglars on Thursday night last by HOLMES' BURGLAR ALARM TELEGRAPH. Mr. Myers got a shot through the leg of one of the burglars. Messrs. Hall and Ward, neighbors, were badly robbed the same night, as they had no protection but a number of watch-dogs. E. HOLMES, No. 7 Murray-st.

Mrs. M. G. Brown has received a DOLLAR TEST SET of the METAPHYSICAL DISCOVERY for the manufacture; put up in three-ounce bottles. It passes into the system through Eyes, Ears and Scalp, and will do more to deliver the system from disease than a ton weight of drugs. Sold by J. HUDNUT, Druggist, Herald Building; also of Druggists' Depot. Inclose ten cents to the University, No. 21 Bond-st., for the enlarged pamphlet of sixty-eight pages.

For Chapped Hands, Sore Lips, Rough or dry skin upon the face, use PERRY'S VEGETABLE EMOLLIENT. It is cleanly, agreeable and perfectly efficacious. REAL ESTATE TRANSACTIONS.

At the Exchange, yesterday, Dec. 23, Jas. R. Miller conducted the only auction of the day, namely, a Supreme Court sale in foreclosure, under the direction of H. P. Hoffman, Jr., Esq., referee, of two lots fronting, in all, 50 feet, more or less, on the east side of Third-av., 100 feet south of One Hundred and Third-st., to Joseph Hoffman, for $6,000. The property was sold subject to a mortgage of $4,000 with an unsatisfied interest thereon, and was purchased by JOHN L. and EDWARD BROOKS for $2,100 over and above the amount remaining due on said mortgage and interest. To-day, at the Exchange, the sales announced for next week are all of a legal character. A list of cases set for to-morrow, however, with a statement of the property to be offered in each instance, will be published as usual on Monday. During the coming year the market promises to be marked with considerable activity, and for the month of January a number of important transactions are already projected, to which reference will be made from time to time.

MUNICIPAL MATTERS.

The Work of the Grand Jury—Examination of Judge Bedford.

The Grand Jury of the Court of General Sessions yesterday presented to Recorder HACKETT the following return in reference to the charges made against Judge BEDFORD:

The Grand Jury, At the request of Judge BEDFORD, having investigated the charges made in a certain newspaper of this City against him, of receiving $2,500 in a fraudulent manner from the City Treasury, has examined the witnesses named by him, and especially entitled to this consideration, and respectfully report that Judge BEDFORD was justly and especially entitled to this consideration for the services rendered as Assistant District-Attorney from 1857 to 1866.

LUCIUS A. CORNSTOCK, Foreman.

DEC. 22, 1871.

The Recorder asked: Have you anything further to present to the Court?

FOREMAN—Nothing at present, your Honor.

RECORDER—Then I am discharged, gentlemen.

The Grand Jury then retired to their rooms, and, it is supposed, were engaged in hearing evidence in relation to the charges preferred against Mayor HALL and the editor of a local Republican journal. It was expected that JAMES FISK, Jr., was examined, but all the witnesses summoned refused to testify on the subject. Mr. BROWNE, who figured so prominently in the Fisk-Mansfield litigation; Mr. VANDERPOEL, of the firm of BROWN, HALL & VANDERPOEL, and others were in attendance during the entire day. Mr. FROTHINGHAM, President of the Union Trust Company, was summoned in relation to the connection of that Company with the Charlestown, and the Grand Jury then adjourned until Tuesday at 11 o'clock. The District-Attorney preserved his characteristic silence in relation to the action of the Grand Jury.

Gunnels's Bail.

The bail Bonds for $500,000 in the Connolly civil suit are now completed, and the bondsmen have qualified to the amount of $1,000,000. Nothing remains to secure the release of the Sheriff in the civil action, but to submit the finished bonds to the sheriff. This will not be done, however, until it is positively ascertained from Judge EDMONDS what amount of bail he will accept for CONNOLLY under the eleven criminal indictments brought against him by the Grand Jury, that it may be ready. Judge EDMONDS is now retained upon this point, and from present indications it is almost certain that CONNOLLY will remain in Ludlow-street Jail for some days after Christmas. He is still suffering from physical and mental prostration.

An Attachment Against Connolly's Property.

Judge CARDOZO yesterday issued an attachment against the property of RICHARD B. CONNOLLY, as a suit brought by PATRICK CARRAHAN, late Superintendent of Markets, to recover about $25,000, alleged to have been paid out by him while holding that position, for groceries, provisions, &c., furnished to said CONNOLLY. The attachment was granted, on the ground that he contemplated the removal of his property with the intent to defraud his creditors, which is based on the averment that in recent large real estate transactions the conveyances have all been taken in the name of his wife.

A Washington Market Investigation.

It is stated that an investigation is to be instituted into the affairs of the former Clerk of Washington Market, in order to ascertain what has been done with the large sums of money collected from the occupants of stands in the recently-ill Vesey-street. Some of the stand-holders pay from $50 to $100 a year for the privilege of having their old walks for their stands, and one dollar of which has gone into the City Treasury.

Street-Cleaner Commissioners.

At an informal meeting of the new Court-house Commissioners, a plan was submitted for the demolition of the building, which, it was said, would cost only $175,000. As the Commissioners have no funds on hand, and do not expect to have either after the Legislature meets, nothing was decided on.

Corner Officers Sentenced.

JOHN HICKEN, THOMAS WATERS and ROBERT LOVE, officers of the Court of General Sessions, were yesterday dismissed by Controller GREEN.

Tweed's Residence.

It is confidently asserted that some of TWEED'S business will not be this to-morrow, Wednesday, the 26th of December, is the time fixed for the justification.

The Sheriff's Office.

Nothing new transpired at the Sheriff's office yesterday. A rumor prevailed that no arrests would take place until after Christmas Day.

The Cold Weather—More Snow.

The mercury in the thermometer reached 20° above zero on Thursday evening; at midnight 20°. Yesterday, snow, mingled with sleet, began to fall between 10 and 11 A. M., and still continued at 9½ P. M.; depth one and a half inches. The readings of the thermometer and barometer were as follows: Thermometer at 7 A. M., 19°; barometer, 30.05. Thermometer at noon, 30°; barometer, 30.00. Thermometer at 6 P. M., 30°; barometer, 29.90. Thermometer at 9 P. M., 30°; barometer, 29.85. Thermometer at 2 P. M. 30°; barometer, 30.05.

The coldest day last Winter was Feb. 9, the mercury indicating 2 above zero. Hundreds of people skated on the East River on the 9th between 1 and 3 P. M. Feb. 11. Yesterday and Friday the ice was found in the East Rivers most filled with floating cakes, and the ferry-boats experienced some difficulty in making regular trips.

Collector Arthur and Wife.

Collector ARTHUR has written to the Chamber of Commerce, asking that body to co-operate with a committee of ware-house proprietors, and a committee of Custom-house officers, for the purpose of fixing the rental prices on the storage of unclaimed goods. The rates have been increased since last [illegible]

Offer to the trade a most complete assortment of FINE ELECTRO-PLATED TABLE-WARE, including not only articles of domestic use, but a large variety of ornamental finishes particularly suited for presents. Particular attention is invited to the Company's recently patented process of electro-plating the smoothed domestic articles, Forks, Spoons, &c., by which the parts most exposed to wear receive an EXTRA COATING OF SILVER, THERE BEING THUS THE USUAL THICKNESS. A feature which renders the production of this Company more enduring than that of any other manufacture, while the cost is relatively very small. The METALLIC PORCELAIN-LINED, FIRE-PROOF BAKING-DISH, another specialty of this Company, while highly ornamental as an item of table furniture, possesses the rare qualities of never burning out, retaining the heat a much longer time than other dishes, and cooking its contents to all parts to perfection. THE PORCELAIN-LINED ICE-PITCHER, a third specialty, are now known all over the world, and valued for their extraordinary property of retaining the purity and coolness of water, as well as for the singular durability, cleanliness and chemical excellence of their interior surfaces. A full stock of these goods may be found in every considerable city of the Union. To protect the purchaser against worthless imitations, it should be observed that this improved spoons and forks are uniformly stamped 1847—ROGERS BROS.—XII., and our trade-marks as below.

ENGLAND.

Further in the Church—Important Conferences and Movements—The Conservative Element—The Prince Minister's Creed.

From a Special Correspondent.

MALVERN, England, Saturday, Dec. 2, 1871.

Three powerful societies are organized and at work in the Church of England, each with a strong army of ecclesiastic, clergymen and lay members—each with abundant funds, organs and machinery for carrying out its objects—and each with objects widely varying from that of the two other societies—so widely that the success of either would drive from the Church both the others. The English Church Union, which held one of its meetings this week in Nottingham, maintaining the "Catholic" or "Ritualist" movement in the Church. It upholds the divine authority of the Episcopate, the high-Church doctrines respecting the sacraments, baptismal regeneration, confession, absolution, and approves of vestments; going as far and even further than Rome; in most things, however, copying so closely that only an adept can distinguish the difference between them. The Church Defence and Reform Association belongs to the Evangelical section, but is chiefly engaged now in defending the threatened establishment. Thus it does not discuss doctrines, but seeks to unite churchmen of all opinions in the defence of the threatened temporalities—the large stock of logwe and dishes now in danger. This bud secured, they will be free to prosecute the Ritualists. The Prayer-book Revision Society is a Church Protestant association of the most radical type, and its whole energies are directed to the extirpation of all the rags and relics of Popery from the Book of Common Prayer. The word "priest" must be erased from it; the lessons from the Apocrypha expunged; the public reading of the Athanasian Creed discontinued or made optional; repetitions in the services to be cut dod; everything expunged from the Communion service which favors the idea of priestly absolution, sacramental mystery, sacrifice, or any change in the elements by consecration; and the same reforms are to be carried into the Baptismal service and the forms of ordination. In short, the Prayer-book is to be made thoroughly Protestant. Here, then, are three associations, which, to an outsider, seem to represent three distinct churches—one "Catholic" and Sacramentarian, one Puritan and Anti-Sacramentarian, one Establishmentarian. The latter strives to be the bond to hold the other two together. It says, in effect, let us lay aside all doctrines, stop all disputes, and hold fast to our establishment and our benefices. Outside of all are Mr. MIALL and the whole body of dissenters and secularists, forming, possibly, a majority of the people of England, earnestly at work to overthrow a Church which seems utterly unable to hold itself together. It has been discovered that an important error exists on the very title-page of the Revised Book of Common Prayer, which retains the phrase "United Church of England and Ireland." No such institution now exists, and the Church of Ireland is making a prayer-book to suit itself. The Throne is threatened by rapidly-forming Republican clubs; the House of Lords is threatened by not a few members of the House of Commons, among whom Mr. HARDY will appear next session as a leader; the Church is assailed from without, and torn by intestine divisions. It really does seem like "shooting Niagara."

IMPORTANT MOVEMENTS.

The most important business transacted at the meeting of the Church Union was the adoption of two resolutions—one to resist Dissenting services in church-yards; the other, that the decisions of the Privy Council are not binding on the clergy. Hats in rebellion proposed against an act of Parliament in one case, and rebellion against the royal prerogative in the other. Rev. C. F. LOWDER, in proposing the resolution to resist the Burials bill, which would allow Dissenters to be buried in church-yards by their own ministers said:

"Why was the church-yard made a vile corpus? Were not the church-yards as sacred as the churches themselves? Their dead were buried there, the blessed sacrament was offered for their departed souls, they were in Paradise equally from their labors, and the living still had communion with them, believing, as they did, in the communion of saints. The Church might be disestablished, but establishment was a mere accident of the Church. Disestablishment would make it more difficult for those who held like views with himself, for they depended on something better than establishment—something better than the favor of the State."

Rev. E. L. BLENKINSOP said in proposing the resolution:

"The constituting of the Court of Privy Council as a Court of final appeal in spiritual causes is a violation of the compact between the Church and the State in the reign of WILLIAM IV., and that consequently the fundamentals of the said Court in matters spiritual are not binding on the conscience of the clergy. If the State violated its compact and taken on itself to do that which it had no right to do, were not the clergy absolved in conscience from obeying that which they were bound to resist? He did not but he hoped that hundreds of the clergy would submit to penalties rather than violate their conscience, and that thousands of the laity would support them. If, in the case just begun, judgment should be given against Mr. BENNETT, the clergy would know that it was more than ever their duty to maintain the doctrines, and more than ever the duty of the laity to uphold it. The clergy were willing to bear penalties, but they would not falsify their professions as priests of the Church."

And the Ritualist clergy will not leave their cures, but submit to be dragged out one by one, martyred by costs, fines and imprisonment, and will appeal to the conscience of the laity to sustain them. Why Dissenters should wish to be buried in church-yards which they give a wide berth to as long as they are above ground, I have no notion. Why the Court of the Privy Council should care what vestments a clergyman wears or how he stands and kneels in religious services, I see as little. It seems tyrannical and nonsensical; but there is a great slight about these two matters, and will be, unless there is speedy disestablishment. If the Church were disestablished, I presume the dissenters of all creeds would be contentedly in their own burying-grounds, and Mr. MACHONOCHIE kneel and Mr. PURCHASE dress according to their proclivities.

THE CONSERVATIVE ELEMENT.

Money is the conservative element in the Church. If disestablished, what is to become of her great property and revenues? Let the Church of England become merely an Episcopalian denomination, on the same footing with the Kirk, and her property would have to be divided with the others. Enthusiastic young curates do not care for this, but elderly clergymen with large families must think of it. Two Archbishops and twenty-six Bishops cost $642,500 a year, the Deans apiece; and nearly as much more is expended upon the almost useless cathedrals. On an average one English Bishop and his cathedral cost enough to comfortably maintain one hundred clergymen. In fact, the library of Brandon of Russia do not cost their respective Governments more than about this proportion. Hence when the great mass of Englishmen learn to think and vote, they are pretty sure to make some important changes.

MR. GLADSTONE'S CREED.

Mr. WHALLEY has made another effort to solve the vexed question whether the Prime Minister is a Papist. He forwarded to the Premier a resolution adopted by the Liberal leaders among his constituents. They resolved "that the question whether the Prime Minister is a member of the Church of Rome, in the present position of the Liberal Party, is one of great political importance." Mr. WHALLEY received an answer to his letter from Mr. GLADSTONE, but it was evasive if not Jesuitical. He does not say that he is or is not a Roman Catholic. He says it is an unsettling question and refuses to answer it, unless the following paragraph from his letter can in some way be twisted into an answer:

BALMORAL CASTLE, Sept. 27, 1871.

MY DEAR SIR: I quite agree with the views of your constituents, on whose behalf you address me, in thinking that the question "Whether the Prime Minister of this country is a member of the Church of Rome," and, being such, not only declines to avow it, but gives through a long life all the external signs of belonging to a different communion, is a question "of great political importance," and this not only "in the present" but in any possible "position of the Liberal" or any other "party." The importance of the question whether he is the subject of concern in the Kingdom which he has a share in ruling; and instant atonement from his office would be the smallest of the punishments he would deserve.

That may be very fine, but a little word of two letters MR. WHALLEY and his friends would have considered more satisfactory. In fact, MR. WHALLEY wrote again for a plain yes or no, and the Premier has, it is said, "given much the answer he will probably prevent MR. WHALLEY from renewing the correspondence." MR. GLADSTONE says:

MY DEAR SIR: In no degree altering my belief as to your intention, I must, while acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 14th, acquaint you that in my opinion your reiterating the inquiry to which that letter refers, with the reasons of any considerable length, is not consistent with those laws which ought to regulate the intercourse between man and man. I am thus led to fear that in my desire to give you satisfaction I have already offered explanations which I ought to have withheld, and I will not expose the error by continuing in any form this correspondence. THE FRENCH REPUBLIC.

The Reconstruction of President Thiers—The Seat of Government—Embers of Strife—A Possible War—The Recent Executions—The Death-Penalty Unpopular.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Monday, Dec. 4, 1871.

As I write the new session of the National Assembly has commenced, and the members are actively engaged in drawing lots for the various committees. It is presumed that this work will occupy all of today, and that the message of the President will not be read before to-morrow. But that question depends entirely upon the feelings of M. THIERS. The King says "I will," and there is no reply. If he has made up his mind to deliver his message today, he will simply enter with a Je veux, and with top-boots and riding-whip, if he sees fit. For a long time the French have been crying out against the Germans for permitting such an absolute sovereign as the Emperor WILLIAM, but that powerful monarch has nothing like the power of Prince ADOLPH L., of the Order of the Golden Fleece. It would be difficult to find a more absolute ruler this side of the Golden Horn, for if the Czar of Russia has the power he does not pretend to make so extensive a use of it. "These gentlemen of the army," he said, not long ago, "may have been Bonapartists or Republicans; but now they are ready to get themselves killed for me—plain Monsieur THIERS!" And the President smiled a grim smile, which can be imagined after a glance at his photograph. There is no doubt of this fact. Unless the Duc of MAGENTA chooses to put himself at the head of the army and break away from the War Office, it is held by the hands of M. THIERS, and he now feels that his hold is very firm. The day for clemency has come, he said not long ago, and now let us be severe. He began with his strongest antagonist—the Press—and disabled it in the first round. Then he put his foot down upon the right of meeting and of discussion; it could not be permitted in the present state of France. Despite the pleadings of every Republican in France, despite the warnings which came from every side, he permitted ROSSEL to be killed, and, if he had really been a Republican at heart, he must have forbidden the execution on the simple ground that it was almost a death-blow to the Republic. FERRE, an assassin, was raised to the rank of a martyr by being shot with ROSSEL; and GASTON CREMIEUX died while crying "Vive la République." BOURBAKI has just gone back to Lyons with orders to use the "last severity," and to crush out all opposition, while M. THIERS himself professes to be able to twist the neck of the entire Assembly, and shows his pride in his own ability, and laughs at his cleverness in playing the various parties against each other, so that all play into his hands. It is the old game of personal rule at which, like NAPOLEON III., M. THIERS will trip one day or another. Just now he has everything his own way. He can pass any measure he desires, he can carry any election, except in the rebellious City of Paris, and the army is quite ready to get itself killed for him in any work which he may command.

THE SEAT OF GOVERNMENT.

There seems to be no doubt in the minds of a majority here that the Government will soon be brought to the city. Yet, on the other hand, it is known that a large number of Deputies are violently opposed to it. During the vacation very extensive changes have been made in the hall, and a warming apparatus constructed at an expense of nearly half a million of francs. This was inspected, the other day, by a committee, which reported that the hall had been "fitted up regardless of expense." If M. THIERS knows that the Chamber will come to Paris, this is a useless tax upon the Treasury.

FUTURE OF FRANCE.

The second great question regards the Assembly itself. It is presumed that it will declare itself permanent, to be renewed one-fifth at a time, which would give each Deputy five, and, if re-elected, ten years of office. The scheme, as I have told you, embraces the Presidency for life of M. THIERS. Could there be a coup d'état more marked than all this? As M. THIERS is seventy-five, the matter does not seem to have great inconvenience, but the Duc D'AUMALE is a young man yet, and M. THIERS, M. CASIMIR PERIER, M. BARTHELEMY, SAINT-HILAIRE, and a large number of others are deliberately working to arrange the affair so that D'AUMALE can immediately succeed to the Presidency. Where then would the country be? The result is not difficult to foresee. All parties would combine in opposition, and, if the monarchy was not constituted upon the old imperial basis, the Presidency of the Duke would be gradually undermined and overthrown.

A POSSIBLE WAR.

I see but one possible issue without a new revolution, and that is by a successful foreign war. Preparations are being made upon a most gigantic scale, and utterly regardless of expense. Nothing but the imminent prospect of another war could excuse such a monstrous imposition upon an overburdened Treasury. The present hope of the French is in an alliance with Russia; but I very much doubt whether, at the first shade of suspicion, M. DE MOLTKE does not march an army straight through Champagne, and while the French are grinding their coffee or preparing their soup for the campaign. No army moves so slowly or so heavily as the French. It cannot march. Its young and undersized soldiers are overburdened with luggage, and it has never been accustomed to rapid movements and marches. It took DUCROT three days to get his army from the Marne to Mont Valerien, a course made by the omnibus in about two hours and a half, and it requires something like six hours to get a French regiment into a railroad train. In case of the prospective war, the result will be decided by the rapidity of the first operations. Certainly Gen. VON MOLTKE is prepared, and M. THIERS is doing his best to get ready. During the past few days there is a general talk of another war, and the French are as anxious for it as ever; but this time they will go into it with allies, and that will counterbalance, they think, something of the demoralization. Fifteen French officers have already gone to Russia, and it is stated that a Russian agent is openly offering inducements to competent engineers to enter that service. After this you will not be surprised to hear that M. THIERS will take a lesson from Prince BISMARCK'S speech, and demand the absolute control of a fund necessary for immediate war preparations. This, it is said, will be raised through the Bank. If its circulation is increased, and it is allowed to float another lot of paper, it can make another loan to the Government, or leave in the hands of M. THIERS the two or three hundred millions already owing.

THE RECENT EXECUTIONS.

The troubles which were predicted as certain to arise from the executions of Satory are already beginning. There is serious trouble in the camp. I told you in my last of the religious report, or the way religion had been mixed with the murder, and the first reports have greatly swollen in the course of travel. Quite a number of confirmatory facts are given, but, as I have no means of verifying them, I let them pass, simply remarking that in France, as a late Consul-General sought to know and feel, it is a most excellent thing to have an uncle who is a Bishop. But there are other rumors not less noteworthy. It is said that the members of the Commission who voted for ROSSEL'S death were all Orleanists, the Napoleonists and Bonapartists voting against it. But that is not the worst. Time and time again ROSSEL'S poor father came from M. THIERS' Cabinet quite redolent with joy to tell every one that the President had given him a promise that he would do all he could for his son. At the last interview M. THIERS told him that he had done all that he could, but the matter had been taken out of his hands; yet he gave the poor father hope. The day of the execution M. THIERS told a journalist that he had used all of his influence to save ROSSEL'S life, but the Committee were obstinate. M. SAINT-HILAIRE repeated this to several reporters, and dwelt upon it in a way not to be misunderstood. That evening the Bien Public, whose editor is on M. THIERS' staff, or in his Cabinet, asserted that the deed was done despite the earnest prayers and solicitations of M. THIERS. The effect of such language can be easily imagined. The day before the members of the Commission had separated, and most of them left for the country. They were at once called back by telegraph. A meeting was held and a deputation sent to the President for explanation. From this point we have no real information, but it is certain that the members of the Commission demanded to know by what right M. THIERS made such statements, and, by trying to relieve himself of the dreadful responsibility, had thrown it all upon them. The friends of the members say that the President made only a lukewarm defense of ROSSEL, and that had he expressed a wish to spare his life, it would have been done. Then the Commission resigned in a body, or so it was reported, but this was officially corrected by the remark that the Commission had not resigned, but that, owing to altered circumstances, it would have to be reconstituted. This is a pretty clear proof that the rumor is not far wrong. On the streets it is said that there is "the mischief to play" about this matter, and that it will give rise to a stormy scene in the Assembly; but M. THIERS has appealed to the patriotism of at least one member of the Commission, showing him that it is his duty to suffer in silence for the good of the country, and that his patriotism cannot fail to be rewarded at a later period. The names of the members have all been published, but each one claims to have been in the minority which voted against the execution.

THE DEATH-PENALTY UNPOPULAR.

But it is certain that ROSSEL'S death will not be without some good result, and the first is the abolition of the death-penalty. The affair at Sartory did not have its intended effect upon the army, and it raised a cry of horror everywhere else. LULLIER, that singular, crack-brained sailor, also condemned to death, seems to be the only one who does not rejoice at this result. The other condemned were, with a cruelty which could have been avoided, informed of the death of ROSSEL, and one of the jailors who has been cuffed and knocked about by LULLIER, told him that his turn would come in the morning. He was very gay all day long. That evening a greffier entered his cell and commenced reading the verdict of the Court-martial, condemning him to death. LULLIER smiled and bowed and rubbed his hands with an air of great satisfaction; but his face instantly fell and he looked up almost in anger when the clerk came to the paragraph commuting his sentence. He rose in rage and began pacing his cell. "Sapristi!" he cried, "ROSSEL is the only man who has had any luck!" ASHBY.

UNITED ITALY.

A Civic Festival in Rome—Opening of the First Parliament—A Future Queen—The Scene in the Chamber—Evening Sights—Momentous Questions—The Jesuits and the Government.

From Our Own Correspondent.

ROME, Tuesday, Nov. 28, 1871.

The Romans were favored with fine weather yesterday for their first great civic festival under Parliament and King. After days of rain, the sun shone out of a cloudless sky and the air had the genial mildness of St. Martin's Summer. The city blossomed like a garden with the gay banners and the draperies of an Italian festa. The country has been looking forward to the day for the opening of the first Parliament in Rome as one to be set down with a red-letter mark in the historical calendar. By the display of musical energy, the Deputies' Chamber was got ready for the day named, and Signor OTTINO, the famous decorator of Turin, did his part to make old Rome wear an aspect worthy of such a famous day of idle. From the Quirinal Hill to Monte Citorio, all along the route by which the royal cortège was to pass, Venetian masts were raised, on which banners were hung, and the escutcheons of the principal Italian cities. Through the whole distance lines of troops of the regular army and the National Guard hedged the way. The streets were thronged with half the population of Rome, and every window and balcony was filled with well-dressed laughing groups of men, women and young people, waiting to have their look at the spectacle of the day.

A FUTURE QUEEN—THE KING.

The Princess MARGHERITA left the palace half an hour in advance of the King, and was received with many demonstrations of affectionate goodwill from the people, whose respect and attachment she has won by her amiable qualities. The wife of the future King of Italy does her part to increase the popularity already enjoyed by the reigning family. The King, accompanied by the hereditary Prince, and the Prince CARIGNANO, went in a train of what is called mezza gala—very elegant, but not of full royal state. I do not know how better to express it than to say that a great wave of enthusiasm rolled on before and followed after the carriage of the Sovereign. I never saw the King look better. He and the hereditary Prince wore the uniforms of Generals of the army. Through the whole route the King remained uncovered, acknowledging the salutations of cheers and waving hats and handkerchiefs coming from every side. VICTOR EMMANUEL has an excellent reputation for punctuality, and the clock was striking eleven when the King and his company entered the Deputies' Hall. The published programme is carefully carried out on occasions where the King is an actor; the people are not kept waiting a minute beyond the time named.

THE SCENES IN THE CHAMBER.

The interior of the Chamber presented an animated scene. All the tribunes in the lofty and really noble room were filled a full hour before the arrival of the King and his company, and there was time enough for the numerous stylish groups to admire each other and inspect the beauties of the room before the interval of happy expectancy was brought to a close. When the King entered the whole company rose and gave vent to a burst of enthusiasm, hardly less noisy and emphatic than the demonstrations of the square. The speech which the Ministers had prepared was read in twelve minutes, and contains as little as any royal speech recently made; for what can the Sovereign say in addition to what already everybody knows, and has been before so many times repeated. The King went out immediately after the discourse was pronounced, and returned to the Quirinal Palace.

EVENING SIGHTS.

The illumination in the evening was successful, and quite satisfactory to the crowds which thronged the streets. I do not remember any Papal lighting up so brilliant, and the former Government was famous for such shows. Of course the illumination of St. Peter's must be left out of the account, for that is a display of exceptional beauty, of which there is no prospect of a renewal for some time to come. It was a picturesque sight to see the Pantheon, black with the rust of a thousand years, peering in grim dignity through a mask of colored lights borrowed from a French pyrotechnic show. If there had been the Girandola of the Pincian Hill the festival would have been crowned with the finest which never failed in the Pope's efforts to amuse the people.

THE DIPLOMATIC CORPS.

Most of the Ministers of foreign Powers accredited to this Court were present at the royal session; although reports had been put afloat by the clerical enemy that, for one or another alleged reason, several of the representatives of Catholic States would not be present in Rome. But even more encouraging than this, a number of those charged with a diplomatic mission near the Pope, were spectators in an unofficial way of the ceremonies of the opening. Several measures of law are matured in Committee, and the promise is made that the Deputies will go to work and accomplish as much as possible before the vacation of several weeks, which is always allowed at the end of the year.

MOMENTOUS QUESTIONS.

The newspapers are jubilant in their tone, and say, justly, that the 27th of November, 1871, will figure among the remarkable days of the Italian revolution. But there are some thoughtful minds, making little account of a showy pageant, and not at all carried away by an ephemeral enthusiasm, who are asking the question, Will the new edifice and the good work stand the shock of the convulsions which are still threatening Europe? The Italians have obtained the greater part of their present advantages at small cost. They owe their benefits, not to great battles fought by themselves, but to a concurrence of fortunate circumstances, and to their own judgment, prudence and good sense. The Italian Kingdom has many enemies, of the same religious faith, in all parts of the world. They will labor untiringly to ruin the work which so far is tolerably well done. The question only remains, Will this people, whose conduct has been so good when small trials have tested the temper of the metal of which they are made, be proof against the fiery affections which may be in reserve? Is there a heroism sturdy enough to fight to the last, and make sacrifices, if necessary, of hundreds of thousands of men? The King did well in his speech to dwell with emphasis upon the importance to the nation of learning to love hard work. As we so well know, it is the best preparation for hard fighting, which all great nations, to have their rights respected, are liable at any time to be called upon to do.

THE JESUITS AND THE GOVERNMENT.

Father BECK, the General of the Company of Jesuits, has published an appeal to the representatives of foreign Governments on the question of the seizure by the Italian authority on the plea of public utility, of the great convent of St. Andrew of the Quirinal. It is not easy for us to appreciate fully the feelings of the Jesuits, or the clerical class, on receiving notice to quit an establishment which has been a leading educational seminary for more than three hundred years. The protection of the American authority was at one time invoked, as a few years back the Latin school of the Americans was, by an order of the Pope, opened in that establishment. We must wait to see what response will be made to the present appeal, and its effect upon the Italian Government.

ANGELICO.

THE GERMAN EMPIRE.

Close of the Parliamentary Session—The Army Estimates—The Bill Against Priests—The Prussian Diet—Financial Affairs.

From Our Own Correspondent.

BERLIN, Saturday, Dec. 2, 1871.

The session of the German Parliament has been brought to a close somewhat abruptly. M. VON DELBRUCK, who conducts the Government business in the House as Prince BISMARCK'S vicegerent, yesterday produced a document, under the Imperial seal, dated 30th November, proroguing the Assembly until further notice. The object of this hurry is not quite apparent; but as it is the second instance of so sudden a dismissal, the step can hardly be accidental. M. VON DELBRUCK stated the inconvenience of simultaneous sittings of the Imperial and various local Parliaments as his reason, but as that inconvenience had been suffered for the better part of the week, a few hours could not make any difference. Your patriotic German loves a little ceremony, just at the beginning and the end, a loyal speech from the President, three cheers for "his most gracious Emperor and master," and an Imperial smile, even though conveyed by the grim visage of M. BISMARCK or ROON, and this unceremonious manner of sending him about his business—especially after being so very yielding and obedient—is interpreted into a mark of disfavor or disrespect. Even the national liberals profess themselves dissatisfied, and mumble secretly about the proverbial "German patience" coming to an end. The House certainly did not deserve Imperial pleasure or disfavor, for it has passed the proposed measures with exemplary readiness, and toward the end with so great haste that the meaning of the bill affecting the rayon of fortresses remains a secret to the great part of the people for want of discussion, though it is really one of importance, inasmuch as it considerably limits the rights of property in the neighborhood of fortresses. The matter of the bill is not new, but it extends the provision over a far greater area, by widening the rayon in accordance with the wider range of the ordnance in the present day.

THE ARMY ESTIMATES.

The army estimates have been carried by a majority of 150 to 124. Ministers then demanded a nominal record of votes, and by this measure some of the minority were brought to join the Conservative side, while a few abstained from voting altogether, modifying the figures thereby to 152 and 128. This changeableness hardly reflects favorably on members. Even such questionable support was conceded only by the Ministers striking the patriotic cord of the German heart, which, as usual, yielded to the magic touch, though not with the readiness of former occasions. M. VON DELBRUCK urged the Ministerial cause by pointing out that, before the proposed period of three years is over, France will have paid off her indemnity, and will consequently be plotting revenge—an unfriendly stricture against which French journals justly protest. In such an event it will be most prejudicial to the peace of Europe to have a new German Army Budget brought before the world, looking, in the eyes of the ignorant, like a fresh armament, and consequently a threat of war. This adduction of the "hereditary arch foe" argument told on the other side. Count ROON improved the victory by an attack in another quarter. "We are drifting into a fresh parliamentary conflict, gentlemen, and I leave you to judge what the effect must be upon Europe in our newly-constituted Empire." That gained the day; for members know that Count ROON is not of a mind to yield, and, having once tasted defeat, they dread a "conflict" as they would the cholera. Count ROON has really obtained a little more than he asked for for the next year, by foregoing his claim to higher estimates in 1872 and 1874, which he treats as a sacrifice. However, he promises he will "risk" it and try his best.

THE BILL AGAINST PRIESTS.

The bill making political speeches from the pulpit punishable has been passed, but not without serious objection being taken to the wording by the Governments of Saxony and Mecklenburg. Wurtemburg likewise lodged a protest against the exclusion of the alternative of a fine, and Hesse only acceded at the last moment. Saxony and Mecklenburg object to one class being singled out for exceptional severity. The bill ought to be made to apply to all public attacks on institutions of the State. As it is, the objecting Governments do not anticipate a satisfactory result. M. VON LUTZ, the Bavarian Minister, will not find a bed of roses prepared against his return home by his energetic action in the anti-clerical cause, for the Catholics seem in a perfect passion of discontent, and considering that they are in a monstrous majority, that opposition must be far from satisfactory. As a palliative for their fury, the Ministers hold one good card in their hand, viz., the reduction of the Budget brought in at the beginning of the session, accounted for by the favorable distribution of the indemnity. It has to be seen if this will provide a sufficient [illegible] The elections are quite prepared for new elections, and have promised their party so to do.

THE FINANCIAL QUESTION.

The Prussian Diet cuts a very poor figure beside the German sister assembly, which is relieved of a great portion of its responsibilities. Prussian subjects have been struck entirely from the legislative repertory, and as the Imperial body comes to usurp more and more power over the States, the range of matters committed to the Diet threatens to dwindle into the driest of the dry. Even a great part of the finance has already changed ministers, but on the whole that subject remains the most important still reserved for discussion in the cider of the Berlin Assemblies. Government has begun its Parliamentary campaign by bringing forward the Budget with very fair success. The present Minister of Finance, M. CAMPHAUSEN, is highly thought of for his businesslike management and his administrative skill. There is an ostensible surplus in last year's accounts of 9,336,600 thalers, but it would be a great mistake to regard that sum as a surplus, in our sense of the word. To do M. CAMPHAUSEN justice, he does his best to rectify that impression, which has, nevertheless, obtained credence abroad, because the telegraphic messenger could not naturally enumerate the details. Prussia has, in a financial sense as well as in a physical, stood the shock of the war bravely, and deserves credit for the regularity with which the blood of the body-politic has been kept flowing during the struggle, and it is suggested that not only taxes have been paid with regularity, but that commerce has rather gathered strength than suffered loss by the strain, put upon the national power. There never was a greater impetus given to commercial undertakings than at present. You are almost inclined to forget that you are still in old-fashioned, humdrum Germany when you witness the spirit of enterprise and speculation evinced on every side of you. But the nominal surplus is based on very different causes from increased taxation. In the first place 3,366,000 thalers out of 8,824,000 are simply paid-up arrears received in consequence of the shortening of the legal terms of grace. Another 3,422,000 thalers have been added to the income that should really have gone to the sinking fund. Government has given up paying off debts in the old manner, and has thus kept the amount free for other purposes. Finally, there is a surplus of 2,140,000 thalers out of the "State treasure," the gulf which has hitherto swallowed up all odd bits of income not included under the ordinary items, with a construction friendly to the State treasure put upon that term. The surplus became available for the general revenue for the first time in 1870. So the boasted surplus of 8,824,000 thalers, if regarded in the manner of ordinary Budgets, dwindles down, in reality into a deficit of nearly 2,000,000. The total income has amounted to 315,000,000 of thalers. Railways have yielded 2,400,000 thalers above the estimates, the bank 711,760 thalers, taxes, in general 943,000 thalers. The accounts of the current year are not yet closed, and it is impossible to make a correct statement with regard to them. The Minister of Finance, however, prepared the House for a less satisfactory report, observing that taxes have remained in arrear, and that the surplus accruing from the State treasure amounts in this year only to somewhere about 2,050,000 thalers.

Addressing himself to the Budget for the coming year, M. CAMPHAUSEN remarked first that the State treasure will be abolished, and that, by employing it for the redemption of State loans, (26,600,000 thalers for redeeming the five per cent. loan of 1850, and 7,668,000 thalers for redeeming five per cent. rentes,) the charge for interest on future Budgets will be considerably reduced. The currency amounts to 1,604,300 thalers in 1872, and to 2,571,000 in 1873. In the Budget for 1872 a total of 186,064,453 thalers is estimated as balancing the income and expenditure; of these 173,479,604 thalers are to go for ordinary, and 12,586,399 for extraordinary expenses. The principal items are these: Cost of the Ministry of Finance, 17,068,976 thalers; Ministry of Commerce, 26,511,439 thalers; Railway Administration, 25,666,888 thalers; Administration of Mines and Salt-works, 20,701,606 thalers; notations, 23,402,000 thalers. The direct taxes are estimated to yield 44,031,000 thalers; the indirect, 18,592,000 thalers; Crown-lands, 20,963,931 thalers; railways, 35,775,920 thalers; mines and salt-works, 26,330,373 thalers; law charges, 13,928,400 thalers, and the lottery, 1,238,800 thalers. The surplus it is proposed to devote to several popular uses, only the complaint is that there is no more apportioned to them, after the somewhat pompous words of the Emperor in his opening speech. I have not adverted to that speech, because the chief points dealt with in it were better discussed in M. CAMPHAUSEN'S address. The opening took place in quite the ordinary manner, on Monday, in the White Hall of the Imperial palace, preceded by a short divine service. His Majesty briefly but pointedly alluded to the happy course of events and the prominent part that Prussia had taken in the war. Remarking on the limitation which the creation of the German Parliament had imposed upon the legislation formerly coming under the notice of the Prussian Diet, he dwelt principally on financial matters, such as the flourishing state of the revenue, the abolition of the State treasure, the appropriation of the surplus, announcing in conclusion some bills not yet made public, as the extension of communal government, and the legalization of civil marriage. All those bills and grants have been clamored for very long by the public, and their announcement consequently gained the Emperor a great deal of applause, only it is now found that the deed is hardly proportionate to the words. The pay of civil officers is raised to a proper status, but the educational grants lag terribly behind public expectation. Only five hundred thousand thalers are apportioned to this object, applying solely to elementary schools, whereas seminaries, gymnasiums and universities, all of them requiring instant and substantial aid, are left to their own inadequate resources. Prussian augenblicks especially resent the comparative discredit into which the University in the Imperial capital is falling, under the ruinous régime of M. VON MUHLER, universities in smaller States having already got far the better of it. The boasted reform of taxation, making so fine a figure in the Imperial speech, moreover, seems hardly to deserve its name, for it amounts only to the saving of one million thalers from other sources from the more lenient handling of existing taxes, to which at any time the screw may be again applied. All these branches of public economy contrast unfavorably with the bloated army Budget recently before the Imperial Parliament.

Dissatisfaction in Kentucky With Mr. McCreery's Re-election to the Senate.

The election of Hon. THOMAS C. MCCREERY to the United States Senate has occasioned the publication of a long and rather incubrious article in the Louisville Courier-Journal, in the course of which the editor says:

"Mr. MCCREERY goes to Washington to sit as the colleague of Gov. STEVENSON in the Senate of the United States. The two are eager private enemies. They hate each other. They distrust each other. There is a feud between them and their friends. No man will deny that this is seriously unfortunate for the public interest. It matters not what causes led to it, or who is to blame for it, the fact is in every way a mischance; and we are free to say—declaring the kindliest feeling for Senator MCCREERY—that, considering the circumstances, we should have sacrificed him on the altar of the State. To do so might have been unjust. But personal claims cannot be considered before great public interests. We would have sacrificed him had he been our next of kin. The Legislature took a more sentimental view of it. Recognizing the Senator's popularity and occasional claims, and sharing a certain undefined sympathy which exists all over the State, it turned away from BECK, BRAMLETTE and HUMPHREY MARSHALL, and gave its support to the candidate whom its predecessor had set aside. There are those who may regard this as a courteous call on Gov. STEVENSON to resign his place he holds. Mr. MCCREERY and his friends assuredly consider it a personal triumph over Gov. STEVENSON; and very likely this will be the general verdict. It is most unfortunate. Gov. STEVENSON will not resign. Sensible people will not expect him to do so. Thus presently we shall have our two Democratic Senators at swords' points, working by cross-purposes, each having the partisans and both warped by their feelings; and this at a time when the Democratic Party in Congress needs to work in concert, to pull all together, to go [illegible]

LOOK OUT FOR A SWINDLER.

A Scoundrel of the First Water Preying on the Community—Nine Victims Numbered Besides Himself.

The vagaries of confidence men are at times instructive—several at present are to the general public. An operator of fine class of the chevalier d'industrie, who has been plying his vocation on [illegible] has recently been unearthed. This infamous scoundrel has been the means of tarnishing the good name of two highly respectable families, has swindled clergymen innumerable, has defrauded statesmen and journalists, black-mailed merchants, and has flunked two square meals of whisky by being the means of having incarcerated in the Ludlow-street Debtors' Prison an innocent man, who suffered five months' confinement, and was released, but a week or so ago by an order of Judge SANDFORD. A THIEF reported the interest some few particulars of the rogue's career and many exploits, the publication of which, it is to be hoped, may lead to his arrest.

This new luminary travels under the assumed name of JOYCE. He is a thin, cadaverous-looking man, of the Uriah Heep pattern, is generally shabby, shaved, dresses in sombre black, wears a white cheaker and is apparently not beyond fifty years of age. His first appearance on Republican soil was noted at Cincinnati some three years ago. He informed his acquaintances at that time that he had come direct from Sidney, Australia, where he had been managing a colonial newspaper, but as it had failed to prove remunerative he resigned. It has since transpired that he was a convict, having been transported for forging a draft on the editor of the Boole Mercury, some seven years ago. Once in the "Queen City" he cast about him for fresh victims, and it was but a few weeks before two were found in the persons of the WEBBERS, BROTHERS, wholesale clothiers, of Vine-street. By acting his role with unexceptionable finesse, he gained their confidence, and was employed as an assistant book-keeper in their store. In the position JOYCE gave entire satisfaction, and the firm were congratulating themselves on the fact of having secured such a competent and trustworthy servant, when, suddenly their establishment was seized by a Government Detective on the complaint of JOYCE, charging them with having made false revenue returns. The case was brought before the Courts for trial. In the meantime, the arch conspirator made a proposition to one of the brothers to draw out of the suit if $5,000 was given him. The was indignantly spurned, the investigation was made, and the firm was promptly exonerated. Foiled in this, he afterward succeeded in obtaining a situation as book-keeper under H. & S. POGUE, city-goods dealers, of Fourth-street. He remained with these gentlemen two months, and was discharged for dishonesty and intemperance. The convict after this turned his mind to religion, joined the Methodist Church during a great revival, became a sparing convert, but fell from grace and was expelled ignominiously for having stolen the minister's overcoat and collecting moneys for the rental of pews. His benign countenance was missed in Cincinnati several months, but he again turned up, and by some means secured a situation on the Cincinnati Enquirer as a reporter. In this new profession he prospered amazingly, and wrote a series of articles on the "Prominent Men of Cincinnati." Hundreds in "Porkopolis" will doubtless remember those brilliant effusions and their little weazen-faced author. Among the gentlemen who fell flattered by his magic quill was Mr. PIO BARACO, the giver of the celebrated fountain to the city. This public-spirited citizen was fleeced to the tune of $50 by the mock scoundrel. Others favored by him were mulcted out of various sums likewise, and his latte financial transactions having reached the ears of the proprietors, the new-fledged journalist was unceremoniously kicked out, and received a touching tribute of esteem in the issue following. In November, 1870, he received a railroad pass to the Metropolis, and arrived here safely, but, in vulgar parlance, completely "busted." Mr. JOYCE was not the genius to remain long in this exceedingly uncomfortable condition, and, after taking in the situation, marched boldly to the Young Men's Christian Association, and by his glibe tongue and innocent manners, contrived to live at their expense near a fortnight. Becoming tired of supporting him, the members gave him a "ticket of leave," and discovered to their sorrow afterward that sundry valuable books and other articles were missing upon his departure.

In due time he visited the publishing firm of VIRTUE & YORSTON, No. 12 Dey-street. They are the agents of several London houses. JOYCE told a plausible story, and he was duly installed as a canvasser, was given valuable specimens, and was provided with an outfit and some ready cash as a "starter." During his first three or four weeks' services he succeeded amazingly, and the firm were well pleased. He was even taken to the family mansion of one of the firm, and was treated with the utmost kindness. Here he created discussion, and having learned the particulars of a domestic misfortune in the household, went stealthily to a weekly newspaper and published a sensational scandal in relation to the family of his benefactor. It was several weeks before his base ingratitude was discovered, and he was discharged. After this event the firm, upon examining his accounts, discovered that he had swindled them to the tune of $1,600. They lost all trace of his whereabouts, and did not discover it until through another publishing house whom he had swindled in a like manner excepting that the sum was not so great. It appears that on the heels of his discharge he visited the publishing house of RICHARDSON & CO., No. 21 Vesey-street. Here he related a pitiful tale, and was fitted out as a canvasser. This firm he victimized considerably, and fled. He next paid his devoirs to Messrs. TRACY & HOWARTH, publishers, formerly of No. 29 Ann-street, but now of Gold-street. These gentlemen suffered greatly by his swindling transaction, as did the firm of HENRY MARTIN & CO., of Ann-street. The globe JOYCE next turned up as a canvasser of the LONDON Printing and Publishing Company of John-street. This firm suffered to the extent of $600 which was only discovered after he had fled and orders came in for books. While with this Company he made the acquaintance of a young gentleman named STEPHENS, residing with his parents at No. 16 East Fourteenth-street. He was introduced into the family and brought disgrace upon his benefactor by his villainous conduct, and left them with considerable cash, money and silver-plate. The fickle trickster next tried his hand at Mason

PEORIA & ROCK ISLAND

First Mortgage

7 Per Cent. Gold Bonds,

Netting about 25 PER CENT. TO THEIR CAPITAL, and about 45 PER CENT. to their YEARLY INCOME.

We recommend these bonds strongly, for the following reasons:

The Road, ninety-one miles in length, is already COMPLETED, and earning much more than the interest on the whole issue of Bonds.

The mortgage, $2,500,000, is less than $16,500 per mile.

The road passes through a rich, populous, agricultural, manufacturing, and coal district.

It connects Peoria and Rock Island, two of the largest and most flourishing cities in Illinois, and forms part of a trunk-line from Indianapolis to St. Paul—976 miles. It also connects two navigable rivers—the Illinois and Mississippi. The bonds are authorized for the entire equipments and necessary buildings required to do the business now offered.

They are coupon bonds, $1,000 each, and can be registered if desired.

Interest, seven per cent., gold, free of tax, payable February and August.

Price, 90, and interest, in currency.

CLEVELAND AND PITTSBURG RAILROAD COMPANY, OFFICE OF SECRETARY AND TREASURER. CLEVELAND, Ohio, Dec. 9, 1871.

THE STOCKHOLDERS OF THIS COMPANY are hereby notified that the new certificates for the guaranteed stock for consolidation of rents under the lease to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, will be issued in exchange for the outstanding certificates of stock, on and after THURSDAY, Jan. 4 proximo. Stockholders registered in New-York will make the exchange at the office of the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company. Those registered in Cleveland at the Company's office, in that city.

The stock to be issued in exchange will be entitled to dividends at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, payable quarterly on the first days of March, June, September and December, respectively in each year, out of the rental received under the said lease, and such dividends will be payable free of the income tax of the United States and of all taxes which may be collected in any manner through or by means of the Corporation owning the road, or the Corporation leasing the same, the payment of all such taxes being assumed by the lessee.

The new issue will be made in the ratio of one hundred and forty-two dollars and eighty-five cents of new stock for every one hundred dollars of the present stock. Persons entitled to the fractional part of a share will receive a scrip certificate therefor convertible into the guaranteed stock when presented in sums of fifty dollars.

The last dividend at the rate of ten per cent per annum, free of Government tax, for the month of November, 1871, being ten-twelfths of one per cent. upon the present outstanding capital stock of the Company, will be paid at the same time and places, in payment of the exchange certificates.

FIRST MORTGAGE

7 Per Cent. Gold Bonds,

LIMITED TO $20,000 PER MILE ON FINISHED ROAD.

The rapid progress toward completion of this great Trunk Line from New-York to the West and to Canada, enables us to offer to investors at PAR AND INTEREST a further limited issue of these favorite securities.

Upward of 140 miles of this road, including the New-Jersey section, are already finished, equipped, and in operation; and contracts with responsible parties have been made for its entire completion by the first day of July next. When this shall have been accomplished its earnings cannot fail to be large and highly remunerative, as it has advantages at least equal to those of any of its competitors for both local and through business. It is building for cash, of which nearly $6,000,000 have been furnished by subscription to its stock at PAR. The work is substantial, and, including equipment, has not exceeded in cost $50,000 per mile, which is less than one-third of the amount at which some of the trunk lines of roads leading from New-York are capitalized, and on which they are paying good dividends.

In view of these facts, the Midland First Mortgage Bonds must be regarded as a first-class security—quite as safe as Governments; and, by making the exchange at the present difference in price, holders of Midland Bonds will receive 33 per cent. more of revenue upon the amount invested than the holders of Government Bonds.
